PROCEEDINGS AND DEBATES

OF

THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

AT THE FIRST SESSION OF THE FIFTEENTH CONGRESS, BEGUN AT THE CITY OF WASHINGTON, MONDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1817.

MONDAY, December 1, 1817.

The first session of the Fifteenth Congress, conformably to the Constitution of the United States, commenced this day, at the City of Washington; and the Senate assembled in their Chamber.

PRESENT:

DAVID L. MORRIL and CLEMENT STORER, from the State of New Hampshire.

JAMES BURRILL, jr., from Rhode Island and Providence Plantations.

ISAAC TICHENOR and JAMES FISK, from Vermont.

DAVID DAGGETT, from Connecticut.

RUFUS KING and NATHAN SANFORD, from New York.

JAMES J. WILSON and MAHLON DICKERSON, from New Jersey.

ARNER LACOCK and JONATHAN ROBERTS, from Pennsylvania.

JAMES BARBOUR and JOHN W. EPPES, from Virginia.

NATHANIEL MACON, from North Carolina.

JOHN GAILLARD and WILLIAM SMITH, from South Carolina.

CHARLES TAIT, from Georgia.

JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, from Kentucky.

JOHN WILLIAMS, from Tennessee.

BENJAMIN RUGGLES, from Ohio.

JAMES NOBLE and WALLER TAYLOR, from Indiana.

JOHN GAILLARD, President pro tempore, resumed the Chair.

CLEMENT STORER, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of New Hampshire, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Jeremiah Mason; JAMES FISK, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Vermont, to supply the vacancy occasioned by the resignation of Dudley Chase; JOHN J. CRITTENDEN, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Kentucky, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last; JOHN WILLIAMS, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, respectively, produced their credentials, which were read; and the oath prescribed by law was administered to them, and they took their seats in the Senate.

JOHN W. EPPES, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for the term of six years, commencing on the fourth day of March last, stated that he had received his credentials, but had neglected bringing them with him, expecting that the Executive of Virginia would forward a duplicate thereof to the Senate, and which he still supposed would speedily be done: whereupon, the oath prescribed by law was administered to him, and he took his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. MACON, the Secretary was ordered to acquaint the House of Representatives, that a quorum of the Senate is assembled, and ready to proceed to business.

On motion by Mr. BARBOUR, a committee was appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what legislative measures may be necessary, for admitting the State of Mississippi into the Union; and Messrs. BARBOUR, KING, and WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BARBOUR presented a copy of the constitution and form of government, as adopted for the State of Mississippi; which was read, and referred to the said committee to consider and report thereon.

On motion by Mr. LACOCK,

Resolved, That each Senator be supplied, during the present session, with three such newspapers, printed in the United States, as he may choose, provided the same be furnished at the usual rate, for the annual charge of such papers; and provided, also, that if any Senator shall choose to take any newspapers, other than daily papers, he shall be supplied with as many such papers as shall not exceed the price of three daily papers.

Messrs. TICHENOR and MACON were appointed a committee, on the part of the Senate, to join such committee as may be appointed on the part of the House of Representatives, to wait on the President of the United States, and notify him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communication which he may be pleased to make to them.

A committee was appointed, agreeably to the 42d rule, for conducting business in the Senate, and Messrs. LACOCK, DICKERSON, and DAGGETT, were appointed the committee.

A committee was also appointed, agreeably to the 22d rule, for conducting business in the Senate; and Messrs. CRITTENDEN, DICKERSON, and RUGGLES, were appointed the committee.

Mr. TICHENOR submitted the following motion for consideration, which was read:

Resolved, That a committee of three members be appointed, who, with three members of the House of Representatives, to be appointed by that House, shall have the direction of the money appropriated to the purchase of books and maps, for the use of the two Houses of Congress.

The resolution was ordered to the second reading, and on motion by Mr. WILSON, it was read a second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House.

On the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative. The resolution was then read a third time by unanimous consent, and passed; and Messrs. DICKERSON, KING, and TAIT, were appointed the committee.

On motion by Mr. TICHENOR,

Resolved, That Mountjoy Bayly, Doorkeeper and Sergeant-at-Arms to the Senate, be, and he hereby is, authorized to employ one assistant and two horses, for the purpose of performing such services as are usually required by the Doorkeeper of the Senate, which expense shall be paid out of the contingent fund.

Mr. TICHENOR submitted the following motion for consideration, which was read:

Resolved, That two Chaplains of different denominations be appointed to Congress, during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly.

Ordered, That it pass to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, it was read a second time by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and no amendment having been proposed, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House.

On the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The resolution was then read a third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that a quorum of the House of Representatives is assembled, and have elected HENRY CLAY, one of the Representatives for the State of Kentucky, their Speaker, and THOMAS DOUGHERTY their Clerk, and are ready to proceed to business.

The Senate then adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 2.

HARRISON GRAY OTIS, from the State of Massachusetts, arrived on the 1st instant, and attended this day.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have appointed a committee on their part, to join the committee appointed on the part of the Senate, to wait on the President of the United States, and inform him that a quorum of the two Houses is assembled, and ready to receive any communications he may be pleased to make to them.

Mr. TICHENOR reported, from the joint committee, that they had waited on the President of the United States, and that the President of the United States informed the committee, that he would make a communication to the two Houses, this day, at twelve o'clock.

PRESIDENT'S ANNUAL MESSAGE.

The following Message was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

Fellow-citizens of the Senate and of the House of Representatives:

At no period of our political existence had we so much cause to felicitate ourselves at the prosperous and happy condition of our country. The abundant fruits of the earth have filled it with plenty. An extensive and profitable commerce has greatly augmented our revenue. The public credit has attained an extraordinary elevation. Our preparations for defence, in case of future wars, from which, by the experience of all nations, we ought not to expect to be exempted, are advancing, under a well digested system, with all the despatch which so important a work will admit. Our free Government, founded on the interest and affections of the people, has gained, and is daily gaining, strength. Local jealousies are rapidly yielding to more generous, enlarged, and enlightened views of national policy. For advantages so numerous, and highly important, it is our duty to unite in grateful acknowledgments to that Omnipotent Being, from whom they are derived, and in unceasing prayer, that he will endow us with virtue and strength to maintain and hand them down, in their utmost purity, to our latest posterity.

I have the satisfaction to inform you, that an arrangement which had been commenced by my predecessor, with the British Government, for the reduction of the naval force, by Great Britain and the United States, on the Lakes, has been concluded; by which it is provided, that neither party shall keep in service on Lake Champlain more than one vessel; on Lake Ontario, more than one; and on Lake Erie, and the upper Lakes, more than two; to be armed, each, with one cannon only; and that all the other armed vessels, of both parties, of which an exact list is interchanged, shall be dismantled. It is also agreed, that the force retained shall be restricted, in its duty, to the internal purposes of each party; and that the arrangement shall remain in force until six months shall have expired, after notice given by one of the parties to the other of its desire that it should terminate. By this arrangement, useless expense, on both sides, and, what is of still greater importance, the danger of collision, between armed vessels, in those inland waters, which was great, is prevented. I have the satisfaction also to state, that the Commissioners, under the fourth article of the Treaty of Ghent, to whom it was referred to decide, to which party the several islands in the Bay of Passamaquoddy belonged, under the treaty of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, have agreed in a report, by which all the islands in the possession of each party before the late war have been decreed to it. The Commissioners, acting under the other articles of the Treaty of Ghent, for the settlement of boundaries, have also been engaged in the discharge of their respective duties, but have not yet completed them. The difference which arose between the two Governments under that treaty, respecting the right of the United States to take and cure fish on the coast of the British provinces, north of our limits, which had been secured by the treaty of one thousand seven hundred and eighty-three, is still in negotiation. The proposition made by this Government, to extend to the colonies of Great Britain the principles of the convention of London, by which the commerce between the ports of the United States and British ports in Europe, had been placed on a footing of equality, has been declined by the British Government. This subject having been thus amicably discussed between the two Governments, and it appearing that the British Government is unwilling to depart from its present regulations, it remains for Congress to decide, whether they will make any other regulations, in consequence thereof, for the protection and improvement of our navigation.

The negotiation with Spain, for spoiliations on our commerce, and the settlement of boundaries, remains, essentially, in the state it held, by the communications that were made to Congress by my predecessor. It has been evidently the policy of the Spanish Government to keep the negotiation suspended, and in this the United States have acquiesced, from an amicable disposition towards Spain, and in the expectation that her Government would, from a sense of justice, finally accede to such an arrangement as would be equal between the parties. A disposition has been lately shown by the Spanish Government to move in the negotiation, which has been met by this Government, and, should the conciliatory and friendly policy which has invariably guided our councils be reciprocated, a just and satisfactory arrangement may be expected. It is proper, however, to remark, that no proposition has yet been made from which such a result can be presumed.

It was anticipated at an early stage, that the contest between Spain and the colonies would become highly interesting to the United States. It was natural that our citizens should sympathize in events which affected their neighbors. It seemed probable, also, that the prosecution of the conflict along our coast, and in contiguous countries, would occasionally interrupt our commerce, and otherwise affect the persons and property of our citizens. These anticipations have been realized. Such injuries have been received from persons acting under the authority of both the parties, and for which redress has, in most instances, been withheld. Through every stage of the conflict, the United States have maintained an impartial neutrality, giving aid to neither of the parties in men, money, ships or munitions of war. They have regarded the contest, not in the light of an ordinary insurrection or rebellion, but as a civil war between parties nearly equal, having, as to neutral Powers, equal rights. Our ports have been open to both, and every article, the fruit of our soil, or of the industry of our citizens, which either was permitted to take, has been equally free to the other. Should the colonies establish their independence, it is proper now to state, that this Government neither seeks nor would accept from them, any advantage in commerce, or otherwise, which will not be equally open to all other nations. The colonies will, in that event, become independent States, free from any obligation to, or connexion with, us, which it may not then be their interest to form on the basis of a fair reciprocity.

In the Summer of the present year, an expedition was set on foot against East Florida, by persons claiming to act under the authority of some of the colonies, who took possession of Amelia Island, at the mouth of the St. Mary's river, near the boundary of the State of Georgia. As this province lies eastward of the Mississippi, and is bounded by the United States and the ocean on every side, and has been a subject of negotiation with the Government of Spain, as an indemnity for losses by spoliation, or in exchange for territory of equal value, westward of the Mississippi, a fact well known to the world, it excited surprise, that any countenance should be given to this measure by any of the colonies. As it would be difficult to reconcile it with the friendly relations existing between the United States and the colonies, a doubt was entertained, whether it had been authorized by them, or any of them. This doubt has gained strength, by the circumstances which have unfolded themselves in the prosecution of the enterprise, which have marked it as a mere private, unauthorized adventure. Projected and commenced with an incompetent force, reliance seems to have been placed on what might be drawn, in defiance of our laws, from within our limits; and of late, as their resources have failed, it has assumed a more marked character of unfriendliness to us; the island being made a channel for the illicit introduction of slaves from Africa, into the United States, an asylum for fugitive slaves from the neighboring States, and a port for smuggling of every kind.

A similar establishment was made, at an earlier period, by persons of the same description, in the Gulf of Mexico, at a place called Galveston, within the limits of the United States, as we contend, under the cession of Louisiana. The enterprise has been marked, in a more signal manner, by all the objectionable circumstances which characterized the other, and more particularly by the equipment of privateers which have annoyed our commerce, and by smuggling. These establishments, if ever sanctioned by any authority whatever, which is not believed, have abused their trust, and forfeited all claim to consideration. A just regard for the rights and interests of the United States required that they should be suppressed, and orders have been accordingly issued to that effect. The imperious considerations which produced this measure will be explained to the parties whom it may, in any degree, concern.

To obtain correct information on every subject in which the United States are interested; to inspire just sentiments in all persons in authority, on either side, of our friendly disposition, so far as it may comport with an impartial neutrality; and to secure proper respect to our commerce in every port, and from every flag, it has been thought proper to send a ship of war, with three distinguished citizens, along the southern coast, with instruction to touch at such ports as they may find most expedient for these purposes. With the existing authorities, with those in the possession of, and exercising the sovereignty, must the communication be held; from them alone can redress for past injuries, committed by persons acting under them, be obtained; by them alone can the commission of the like, in future, be prevented.

Our relations with the other Powers of Europe have experienced no essential change since the last session. In our intercourse with each, due attention continues to be paid to the protection of our commerce, and to every other object in which the United States are interested. A strong hope is entertained, that, by adhering to the maxims of a just, a candid, and friendly policy, we may long preserve amicable relations with all the Powers of Europe, on conditions advantageous and honorable to our country.

With the Barbary States, and the Indian tribes, our pacific relations have been preserved.

In calling your attention to the internal concerns of our country, the view which they exhibit is peculiarly gratifying. The payments which have been made into the Treasury show the very productive state of the public revenue. After satisfying the appropriations made by law for the support of the Civil Government, and of the Military and Naval Establishments, embracing suitable provisions for fortifications and for the gradual increase of the Navy, paying the interest of the public debt, and extinguishing more than eighteen millions of the principal, within the present year, it is estimated that a balance of more than six millions of dollars will remain in the Treasury on the first day of January, applicable to the current service of the ensuing year. The payments into the Treasury during the year one thousand eight hundred and eighteen, on account of imposts and tonnage, resulting principally from duties which have accrued in the present year, may be fairly estimated at twenty millions of dollars; the internal revenues, at two millions five hundred thousand; the public lands, at one million five hundred thousand; bank dividends and incidental receipts, at five hundred thousand; making in the whole twenty-four millions five hundred thousand dollars.

The annual permanent expenditure for the support of the Civil Government, and of the Army and Navy, as now established by law, amounts to eleven millions eight hundred thousand dollars; and for the Sinking Fund, to ten millions; making in the whole twenty-one millions eight hundred thousand dollars; leaving an annual excess of revenue beyond the expenditure of two millions seven hundred thousand dollars, exclusive of the balance estimated to be in the Treasury on the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and eighteen.

In the present state of the Treasury, the whole of the Louisiana debt may be redeemed in the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen; after which, if the public debt continues as it now is, above par, there will be annually about five millions of the Sinking Fund unexpended, until the year one thousand eight hundred and twenty-five, when the loan of one thousand eight hundred and twelve, and the stock created by funding Treasury notes, will be redeemable.

It is also estimated that the Mississippi stock will be discharged during the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, from the proceeds of the public lands assigned to that object, after which the receipts from those lands will annually add to the public revenue the sum of one million and a half, making the permanent annual revenue amount to twenty-six millions of dollars; and leaving an annual excess of revenue, after the year one thousand eight hundred and nineteen, beyond the permanent authorized expenditure, of more than four millions of dollars.

By the last returns to the Department of War, the militia force of the several States may be estimated at eight hundred thousand men, infantry, artillery, and cavalry. Great part of this force is armed, and measures are taken to arm the whole. An improvement in the organization and discipline of the militia, is one of the great objects which claims the unremitting attention of Congress.

The regular force amounts nearly to the number required by law, and is stationed along the Atlantic and inland frontiers.

Of the naval force it has been necessary to maintain strong squadrons in the Mediterranean and in the Gulf of Mexico.

From several of the Indian tribes, inhabiting the country bordering on Lake Erie, purchases have been made of lands, on conditions very favorable to the United States, and, as it is presumed, not less so to the tribes themselves. By these purchases, the Indian title, with moderate reservations, has been extinguished, to the whole of the land within the limits of the State of Ohio, and to a part of that in the Michigan Territory, and of the State of Indiana. From the Cherokee tribe a tract has been purchased in the State of Georgia, and an arrangement made, by which, in exchange for lands beyond the Mississippi, a great part, if not the whole, of the land belonging to that tribe, eastward of that river, in the States of North Carolina, Georgia, and Tennessee, and in the Alabama Territory, will soon be acquired. By these acquisitions, and others that may reasonably be expected soon to follow, we shall be enabled to extend our settlements from the inhabited parts of the State of Ohio, along Lake Erie into the Michigan Territory, and to connect our settlements, by degrees, through the State of Indiana and the Illinois Territory, to that of Missouri. A similar and equally advantageous effect will soon be produced to the South, through the whole extent of the States and Territory which border on the waters emptying into the Mississippi and the Mobile. In this progress, which the rights of nature demand, and nothing can prevent, marking a growth rapid and gigantic, it is our duty to make new efforts for the preservation, improvement, and civilization of the native inhabitants. The hunter state can exist only in the vast uncultivated desert. It yields to the more dense and compact form and greater force of civilized population, and of right it ought to yield, for the earth was given to mankind to support the greatest number of which it is capable, and no tribe or people have a right to withhold from the wants of others more than is necessary for their own support and comfort. It is gratifying to know that the reservations of land made by the treaties with the tribes on Lake Erie, were made with a view to individual ownership among them, and to the cultivation of the soil by all, and that an annual stipend has been pledged to supply their other wants. It will merit the consideration of Congress, whether other provisions, not stipulated by treaty, ought to be made for these tribes, and for the advancement of the liberal and humane policy of the United States towards all the tribes within our limits, and more particularly for their improvement in the arts of civilized life.

Among the advantages incident to these purchases, and to those which have preceded, the security which may thereby be afforded to our inland frontiers is pecularly important. With a strong barrier, consisting of our own people thus planted on the Lakes, the Mississippi, and the Mobile, with the protection to be derived from the regular force, Indian hostilities, if they do not altogether cease, will henceforth lose their terror. Fortifications in those quarters, to any extent, will not be necessary, and the expense attending them may be saved. A people accustomed to the use of fire-arms only, as the Indian tribes are, will shun even moderate works, which are defended by cannon. Great fortifications will, therefore, be requisite only in future along the coast, and at some points in the interior, connected with it. On these will the safety of our towns and the commerce of our great rivers, from the Bay of Fundy to the Mississippi, depend. On these, therefore, should the utmost attention, skill, and labor be bestowed.

A considerable and rapid augmentation in the value of all the public lands, proceeding from these and other obvious causes, may henceforward be expected. The difficulties attending early emigrations will be dissipated even in the most remote parts. Several new States have been admitted into our Union, to the West and South, and territorial governments, happily organized, established over every other portion, in which there is vacant land for sale. In terminating Indian hostilities, as must soon be done, in a formidable shape at least, the emigration, which has heretofore been great, will probably increase, and the demand for land, and the augmentation in its value, be in like proportion. The great increase of our population throughout the Union will alone produce an important effect, and in no quarter will it be so sensibly felt as in those in contemplation. The public lands are a public stock, which ought to be disposed of to the best advantage for the nation. The nation should, therefore, derive the profit proceeding from the continual rise in their value. Every encouragement should be given to the emigrants, consistent with a fair competition between them, but that competition should operate in the first sale to the advantage of the nation rather than of individuals. Great capitalists will derive all the benefit incident to their superior wealth, under any mode of sale which may be adopted. But if, looking forward to the rise in the value of the public lands, they should have the opportunity of amassing, at a low price, vast bodies in their hands, the profit will accrue to them, and not to the public. They would also have the power, in that degree, to control the emigration and settlement in such a manner as their opinion of their respective interests might dictate. I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, that such further provision may be made in the sale of the public lands, with a view to the public interest, should any be deemed expedient, as in their judgment may be best adapted to the object.

When we consider the vast extent of territory within the United States; the great amount and value of its productions; the connexion of its parts, and other circumstances, on which their prosperity and happiness depend, we cannot fail to entertain a high sense of the advantage to be derived from the facility which may be afforded in the intercourse between them, by means of good roads and canals. Never did a country of such vast extent offer equal inducements to improvements of this kind, nor ever were consequences of such magnitude involved in them. As this subject was acted on by Congress at the last session, and there may be a disposition to revive it at the present, I have brought it into view, for the purpose of communicating my sentiments on a very important circumstance connected with it, with that freedom and candor which a regard for the public interest, and a proper respect for Congress, require. A difference of opinion has existed from the first formation of our Constitution, to the present time, among our most enlightened and virtuous citizens, respecting the right of Congress to establish such a system of improvement. Taking into view the trust with which I am now honored, it would be improper, after what has passed, that this discussion should be revived, with an uncertainty of my opinion respecting the right. Disregarding early impressions, I have bestowed on the subject all the deliberation which its great importance, and a just sense of my duty required, and the result is, a settled conviction in my mind, that Congress do not possess the right. It is not contained in any of the specified powers granted to Congress; nor can I consider it incidental to, or a necessary mean, viewed on the most liberal scale, for carrying into effect any of the powers which are specifically granted. In communicating this result, I cannot resist the obligation which I feel, to suggest to Congress the propriety of recommending to the States the adoption of an amendment to the Constitution, which shall give to Congress the right in question. In cases of doubtful construction, especially of such vital interest, it comports with the nature and origin of our institutions, and will contribute much to preserve them, to apply to our constituents for an explicit grant of the power. We may confidently rely, that if it appears to their satisfaction, that the power is necessary, it will always be granted. In this case I am happy to observe, that experience has afforded the most ample proof of its utility, and that the benign spirit of conciliation and harmony, which now manifests itself throughout our Union, promises to such a recommendation the most prompt and favorable result. I think proper to suggest, also, in case this measure is adopted, that it be recommended to the States to include, in the amendment sought, a right in Congress to institute, likewise, seminaries of learning for the all-important purpose of diffusing knowledge among our fellow citizens throughout the United States.

Our manufactories will require the continued attention of Congress. The capital employed in them is considerable, and the knowledge acquired in the machinery and fabric of all the most useful manufactures, is of great value. Their preservation, which depends on due encouragement, is connected with the high interests of the nation.

Although the progress of the public buildings has been as favorable as circumstances have permitted, it is to be regretted that the Capitol is not yet in a state to receive you. There is good cause to presume, that the two wings, the only parts as yet commenced, will be prepared for that purpose at the next session. The time seems now to have arrived, when this subject may be deemed worthy the attention of Congress, on a scale adequate to national purposes. The completion of the middle building will be necessary to the convenient accommodation of Congress, of the committees, and various offices belonging to it. It is evident that the other public buildings are altogether insufficient for the accommodation of the several Executive Departments, some of whom are much crowded, and even subjected to the necessity of obtaining it in private buildings, at some distance from the head of the department, and with inconvenience to the management of the public business. Most nations have taken an interest and a pride in the improvement and ornament of their Metropolis, and none were more conspicuous in that respect than the ancient Republics. The policy which dictated the establishment of a permanent residence for the National Government, and the spirit in which it was commenced and has been prosecuted, show that such improvement was thought worthy the attention of this nation. Its central position, between the Northern and Southern extremes of our Union, and its approach to the West, at the head of a great navigable river, which interlocks with the Western waters, prove the wisdom of the councils which established it. Nothing appears to be more reasonable and proper, than that convenient accommodation should be provided, on a well-digested plan, for the Heads of the several Departments, and of the Attorney General; and it is believed that the public ground in the city applied to those objects will be found amply sufficient. I submit this subject to the consideration of Congress, that such further provision may be made in it, as to them may seem proper.

In contemplating the happy situation of the United States, our attention is drawn, with peculiar interest, to the surviving officers and soldiers of our Revolutionary Army, who so eminently contributed, by their services, to lay its foundation. Most of those very meritorious citizens have paid the debt of nature and gone to repose. It is believed, that among the survivors, there are some not provided for by existing laws, who are reduced to indigence, and even to real distress. These men have a claim on the gratitude of their country, and it will do honor to their country, to provide for them. The lapse of a few years more, and the opportunity will be forever lost; indeed, so long already has been the interval, that the number to be benefitted by any provision which may be made, will not be great.

It appearing in a satisfactory manner that the revenue arising from imposts and tonnage, and from the sale of the public lands, will be fully adequate to the support of the Civil Government, of the present Military and Naval Establishment, including the annual augmentation of the latter to the extent provided for, to the payment of the interest of the public debt, and to the extinguishment of it at the times authorized, without the aid of the internal taxes, I consider it my duty to recommend to Congress their repeal. To impose taxes, when the public exigencies require them, is an obligation of the most sacred character, especially with a free people. The faithful fulfilment of it is among the highest proofs of their virtue, and capacity for self-government. To dispense with taxes, when it may be done with perfect safety, is equally the duty of their representatives. In this instance we have the satisfaction to know that they were imposed when the demand was imperious, and have been sustained with exemplary fidelity. I have to add, that, however gratifying it may be to me, regarding the prosperous and happy condition of our country, to recommend the repeal of these taxes at this time, I shall nevertheless be attentive to events, and, should any future emergency occur, be not less prompt to suggest such measures and burdens as may then be requisite and proper.

The Message was read, and two thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 3.

ROBERT H. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the State of Maryland, arrived on the 2d instant, and attended this day.

Mr. BAREOUR, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a resolution for the admission of the State of Mississippi into the Union; and the resolution was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been proposed thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House.

On the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative.

The said resolution having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, it was read a third time by unanimous consent.

Resolved, That this resolution pass, and that the title thereof be, a "Resolution for the admission of the State of Mississippi into the Union."

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from John Gardiner, Chief Clerk in the General Land Office, presenting to the Senate two copies of a map of the bounty lands in the Illinois Territory, engraved for the use of the soldiers of the late army; and the letter was read.

THURSDAY, December 4.

GEORGE W. CAMPBELL, from the State of Tennessee, arrived the 3d, and attended this day.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from David Holmes, Governor of the State of Mississippi, with a copy of the constitution, as adopted for the government of that State; which were read.

Mr. DAGGETT gave notice, that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a resolution authorizing the distribution of certain public documents.

Mr. TAIT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Senate will on — next proceed to the appointment of the Standing Committees of this House.

FRIDAY, December 5.

OUTERBRIDGE HORSEY, from the State of Delaware, arrived the 4th, and attended this day.

Agreeably to notice, Mr. DAGGETT asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution authorizing the distribution of certain public documents; and the resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 4th instant, for the appointment of the Standing Committees of this House, and, the blank having been filled with "Tuesday," agreed thereto.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they concur in the resolution of the Senate, for the appointment of a joint committee on the arrangements for the Library, and have appointed a committee on their part. They also concur in the resolution of the Senate, for the appointment of Chaplains.

On motion, by Mr. WILSON,

Resolved, That the Senate will, at 12 o'clock, on Monday next, proceed to the election of a Chaplain on their part.

The Senate adjourned to 11 o'clock on Monday morning.

MONDAY, December 8.

MONTFORT STOKES, from the State of North Carolina, arrived on the 5th instant, and attended this day.

The PRESIDENT communicated the credentials of JOHN W. EPES, appointed a Senator by the Legislature of the State of Virginia, for the term of six years, commencing on the 4th day of March last; which were read, and laid on file.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, comprehending the statements relating to the internal duties and direct tax, required by the 33d section of the act of Congress, of the 22d July, 1813; also, a report prepared in obedience to the act, entitled "An act to establish the Treasury Department;" which were read.

The resolution authorizing the distribution of certain public documents, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee; and Mr. DAGGETT, Mr. ROBERTS, and Mr. BARBOUR, were appointed the committee.

Mr. SANFORD submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Finance inquire what alterations or amendments may be requisite in the present system of collecting the duties charged on the value of merchandise imported into the United States; and what farther legal provisions are necessary, in order to secure the equal and certain collection of those duties.

Mr. BARBOUR gave notice, that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a resolution, proposing to the several States an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, on the subject of internal improvements.

TUESDAY, December 9.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 8th instant, for instructing the Committee of Finance to make inquiry in relation to the collection of ad valorem duties on importations; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Tuesday next.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENT.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, in pursuance of notice yesterday given, introduced the following resolution for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in relation to internal improvements:

Resolved, &c., That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution: "Congress shall have power to pass laws appropriating money for constructing roads and canals, and improving the navigation of water-courses: Provided, however, That no road or canal, shall be conducted in any State, nor the navigation of its waters improved, without the consent of such State: And provided also, That whenever Congress shall appropriate money to these objects, the amount thereof shall be distributed among the several States, in the ratio of representation which each State shall have in the most numerous branch of the National Legislature. But the portion of any State, with its own consent, may be applied to the purpose aforesaid, in any other State."

In submitting to the Senate this proposition to amend the Constitution, in respect to the power to establish roads and canals—

Mr. BARBOUR said he felt it due to himself to say, that his opinion had not changed since the last session. He thought now, as he did then, that Congress had the authority already which it was intended to give them by this amendment. He had, in a discussion of some length, which took place during the last session, assigned his reasons for that opinion; their repetition at this time would be impertinent. The fate of the bill which had for its object the appropriation of the bonus of the bank to internal improvements is known to the Senate. The present Chief Magistrate had, he thought, very frankly and properly, disclosed his opinion, and decided it unconstitutional. The impracticability of passing it, with this impediment, through Congress, he presumed, must be palpable. Indeed, he did not know that it was desirable that it should be. It is better, perhaps, in all cases of doubt, to recur to the people—the original and only legitimate fountain of power. For if it were clear that Congress had the power, and it were believed the exercise thereof would be in opposition to the public sentiment, he presumed Congress would forbear to resort to it. The Government being founded on the sovereignty of the public will, it must, it ought to govern. If, on the contrary, the people of the United States wished the measure of internal improvement to be carried into effect, there is no cause to apprehend that the State Legislatures, bringing with them into their councils that will, and the sentiments of their constituents, will withhold the grant of power intended by the proposed amendment. Under the guaranty thus acquired, Congress may proceed with a certainty that they not only have the power, but that it is the wish of their constituents it should be exercised. But if the people should think we have not the power, however they might approve the expediency of the measure, in itself, yet being, in their opinion, out of the limits of our Constitutional power, they, as watchful guardians of the Constitution, could not fail to condemn us. What is the public opinion on this point is difficult to decide, except that we are warranted in saying, if we take the votes of the last Congress as a fair representation, they are nearly equally divided. What course then is better or more conformable to the true spirit of free principles, than to go back to those who made the Constitution, and who alone have power to alter or amend it, for their interpretation? On the one hand there is safety, on the other there may be error. Even in ordinary acts of legislation, when contrary constructions are given to a law, recurrence is had to the framers for an explanatory law. If it be proper in the last case, it applies more strongly in the former. Some gentlemen say that if they vote for this amendment they compromise themselves as to consistency, and weaken the Constitution. Mr. B. did not perceive the correctness of that view of the subject. On the contrary, the vote in favor of the amendment by those holding the affirmative of the right of Congress already, will manifest a liberality by uniting with those who are of a different sentiment; and none will make a surrender of their opinions. For, if the amendment should be carried, whether the opinion as to the present power of Congress be right or wrong will be insignificant. If it should fail, each will recur to his opinion, as now entertained, and act upon it without any restraint arising from his liberality in uniting with those who differ from him on the constitutionality of this question. The principles of the amendment are derived from the bill of the last session. The very full and elaborate discussion which attended the passage of it is an evidence that its form, on the whole, was the most acceptable. For after having given to Congress the power of appropriating money to the objects of internal improvement, it restrains Congress from exercising this authority without the consent of the State in which the improvement is to be made. This prevents an unpleasant collision. Again, the money is to be equally divided among the States according to their federal numbers. Although it might be more advantageous to concentrate the efforts of the United States on some great object, yet there is a fear and jealousy among the small States, that the large would monopolize the whole. Mr. B. recollected the opinion of a gentleman of the Senate last session, now no longer here, of whom he would say, that, although they differed essentially on many political questions of great interest, yet, upon many points, both his judgment and his views were sound, and entitled to very great respect. It was the opinion of this gentleman that this fund, without the security introduced into the bill, and now a part of the proposed amendment, might become an instrument of intrigue and corruption; and a canal or a road might be weighed against a Presidential candidate, and the scale would be inclined as avarice or ambition preponderated. To avoid a consequence so much to be deprecated, he thought the condition of a fixed apportionment among the States a sound one. In any event he was satisfied that without it all attempts at amendment would prove abortive. The small States, it is to be apprehended, will surrender themselves to these fears, if this guaranty is not given; with it there could be no cause of apprehension, and he could perceive no cause to doubt its success. The right of the State, with its consent, to appropriate it to objects without its limits is too obvious to need a comment. He would just observe, however, that the cutting a canal between the Delaware and Chesapeake Bay would furnish an illustration; as Pennsylvania, Maryland, and Delaware might unite in the undertaking. Mr. B. wished further to remark, that this proposition was not made with a view unnecessarily to enlarge the powers of the General Government. He was anxious to see the spirit in which it originated kept perpetually in view; namely, that whatever could be as well done by the States as the General Government, the power of doing it should be retained exclusively to the States; while the General Government should exercise its authority on objects exclusively national; and there should be a coincidence of authority only where its exercise should be dictated by necessity or great advantage. The establishing military roads from one end to the other of this extensive empire, or an internal navigation on the same scale, required the resources and the superintending power of the General Government. While all minor objects of internal improvement, particularly affecting the State, may be therefore well and correctly given exclusively to the States, that which is national should belong to the General Government. It was with these sentiments, Mr. B. said, he presented the proposed amendment to the consideration of the Senate.

The resolution passed to a second reading.

The Senate proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain on their part, and on the ballots having been counted, it appeared that the Reverend WILLIAM HAWLEY had a majority, and was elected.

On motion, by Mr. TAIT, the appointment of the Standing Committees of the Senate, was postponed until Thursday next.

WEDNESDAY, December 10.

ELI P. ASHMUN, from the State of Massachusetts, and GEORGE M. TROUP, from the State of Georgia, severally arrived on the 9th, and attended this day.

The resolution for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in relation to internal improvements, was read the second time, and, on motion by Mr. BARBOUR, referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon. Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. KING, Mr. LACOCK, Mr. MACON, and Mr. EPPEL, were appointed the committee.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have appointed the Reverend BURGESS ALLISON, Chaplain on their part. They have also passed a resolution, directing a distribution of certain laws, among the members of the fifteenth Congress, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolution, last mentioned, was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MORRIL submitted the following motion for consideration:

DECEMBER, 1817.

Standing Committees.

SENATE.

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate such information as he may possess, relating to the progress made in surveying the several tracts of military bounty lands appropriated by Congress, in the State of Louisiana and the Missouri Territory, for the late Army of the United States, and the time at which such survey will probably be completed.

Mr. SANFORD submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury lay before the Senate information of the progress which has been made in the settlement of public accounts, under the act "to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts;" and that he also state what further legal provisions may be, in his opinion, necessary to insure the speedy settlement of public accounts.

THURSDAY, December 11.

JEREMIAH MORROW, from the State of Ohio, arrived on the 10th instant, and attended this day.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, comprehending an account of the fund appropriated for the safe-keeping and accommodation of prisoners of war; which was read.

WALTER LEAKE and THOMAS H. WILLIAMS, respectively, appointed Senators by the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats in the Senate.

The resolution directing a distribution of certain laws among the members of the fifteenth Congress was read the second time, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 8th instant, the resolution authorizing the distribution of certain public documents, to consider and report thereon.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 10th instant, for information relating to the progress made in surveying the military bounty lands; which, having been amended on motion by Mr. MORROW, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate such information as he may possess, relating to the progress made in surveying the several tracts of military bounty lands appropriated by Congress for the late Army of the United States, and the time at which such survey will probably be completed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 10th instant, for information relating to the prompt settlement of public accounts, and agreed thereto.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

The Senate proceeded to the appointment of the following Standing Committees; and, on motion by Mr. TAIT, it was ordered that they consist of five members each:

Committee on Foreign Relations.—Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. MACON, Mr. TROUP, Mr. KING, and Mr. LACOCK.

Committee on Finance.—Mr. CAMPBELL, Mr. EPPES, Mr. KING, Mr. TALBOT, and Mr. MACON.

Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.—Mr. SANFORD, Mr. HORSEY, Mr. MORRIL, Mr. BURRILL, and Mr. DICKERSON.

Committee on Military Affairs.—Mr. TROUP, Mr. WILLIAMS of Tennessee, Mr. TICHENOR, Mr. LACOCK, and Mr. TAYLOR.

Committee on the Militia.—Mr. STORER, Mr. NOBLE, Mr. ROBERTS, Mr. MACON, and Mr. RUGGLES.

Committee on Naval Affairs.—Mr. TAIT, Mr. SANFORD, Mr. CRITTENDEN, Mr. DAGGETT, and Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi.

Committee on Public Lands.—Mr. MORROW, Mr. FISK, Mr. TAYLOR, Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi, and Mr. HUNTER.

Committee of Claims.—Mr. ROBERTS, Mr. MORRIL, Mr. RUGGLES, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. WILSON.

Committee on the Judiciary.—Mr. CRITTENDEN, Mr. BURRILL, Mr. OTIS, Mr. SMITH, and Mr. LEAKE.

Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.—Mr. WILSON, Mr. ASHMUN, Mr. FISK, Mr. RUGGLES, and Mr. STOKES.

Committee on Pensions.—Mr. NOBLE, Mr. STORER, Mr. LACOCK, Mr. VANDYKE, and Mr. TALBOT.

Committee on the District of Columbia.—Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, Mr. DAGGETT, Mr. EPPES, Mr. BARBOUR, and Mr. STOKES.

FRIDAY, December 12.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to abolish the internal duties," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The PRESIDENT communicated two memorials of the commissioned officers (then of the Mediterranean squadron) under the rank of commanders, remonstrating against the treatment received by Captain Heath, of the Marine Corps, from Commodore Perry, and the proceedings thereon; also against the decision in another case, which occurred at Naples between Captain John Orde Creighton and Midshipman Marsden of the Washington; and praying some legislative provision for the more effectual protection of the rights of subalterns; and the memorials were read.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a memorial from the officers of the Marine Corps, (then in the Mediterranean,) on the same subject; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. MACON presented the petition of Joel Rivers, praying permission to purchase four acres of land, near Fort Claiborne, on the Alabama river, to secure the right of a ferry; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. BURRILL presented the petition of D. Lyman and others, a committee acting for and in behalf of the cotton and woollen manufacturers of Providence and its vicinity, praying that the present duties on imported cotton and woollen goods may be rendered permanent, and that provisions may be made more effectually to prevent evasions thereof; and that such further measures for the security and promotion of American manufactures may be adopted, as Congress in their wisdom may deem proper and expedient; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the standing committees of the Senate had leave to report, by bill or otherwise, on all subjects referred to them.

Mr. DAGGETT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law on the subject of bankruptcies, and, if they judge it expedient, to report a bill for that purpose. Also, that the aforesaid committee inquire into the expediency of further provision by law for the punishment of offences committed in places within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Also, into the necessity of further defining piracy and other offences committed on the high seas, and into any defects existing in the laws of the United States for the punishment of crimes and offences.

Mr. DICKERSON presented the memorial of John Dow, and others, manufacturers of iron, praying that a further duty may be imposed on the importation of certain descriptions of iron, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BURRILL presented the memorial of Charles D'Wolfe, and others, merchants of Bristol, in the State of Rhode Island, praying that provision may be made for granting the benefit of the drawback of duties upon the exportation of certain goods therein stated; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Hasfield White, praying to be allowed the payment of a sum placed in his hands for public purposes, but lost in action during the Revolutionary war, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LACOCK submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of dividing the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts, and establishing a district and circuit court of the United States, at the city of Pittsburg, in the county of Allegheny.

On motion by Mr. BARBOUR, the Senate proceeded to ascertain the classes in which the Senators of the State of Mississippi shall be inserted, in conformity to the resolution of the 14th of May, 1789, and as the Constitution requires; and, by the Secretary, rolled up and put into the ballot box; and it is understood that the Senator who should draw the lot No. 3, should be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service respectively expire in six years, from and after the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen, in order to equalize the classes; accordingly Mr. WILLIAMS drew lot No. 3, and Mr. LEAKE drew the blank.

Ordered, That two lots, No. 3, and a blank, be,

It was then agreed that two lots, No. 1, and No. 2, should be, by the Secretary, rolled up, and put into the ballot box, and one of these be drawn by Mr. LEAKE, the Senator from the State of Mississippi, not classed; and it was understood that if he should draw lot No. 1, he should be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service will respectively expire in two years, from and after the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen; but if he should draw lot No. 2, it was understood that he should be inserted in the class of Senators whose terms of service respectively expire in four years, from and after the third day of March, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen; when Mr. LEAKE drew No. 2, and is classed accordingly.

Mr. CAMPBELL submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for authorizing those who hold titles, derived from the State of North Carolina, to lands in that part of the State of Tennessee to which the Indian claim has not been extinguished, to have the boundaries or other land marks of their claims ascertained, and remarked or otherwise identified, in order to perpetuate the evidence to support the same.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act establishing the Mint, and the act concerning the Mint," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. CAMPBELL gave notice that, at the next sitting of the Senate, he should ask leave to bring in a bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants, and perfect titles, on certain entries and locations of lands therein described.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the annual report of the Secretary of the Treasury on the state of the finances, communicated the 8th instant, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

REFERENCE OF PRESIDENT'S MESSAGE.

PUBLIC DEPOSITES.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, explaining the reasons for not transferring the balances from the State banks to the Bank of the United States; which was read. The report is as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, Dec. 10, 1817.

SIR: By the sixteenth section of the charter of the Bank of the United States, the deposits of the public money are required to be made in the Bank and its offices, in the places where they may be established, unless the Secretary of the Treasury shall, at any time, otherwise order and direct; in which case the reasons of such order and direction shall be laid before Congress, if in session, and, if not in session, immediately after the commencement of the next session.

The Bank itself, and its offices established at Boston, New York, Baltimore, and this city, commenced their operations at different periods, between the 1st day of January, 1817, and the 4th day of March ensuing.

If the provisions of the section already stated did not impose the obligation to transfer to the Bank of the United States, and to its offices, the public deposits which had been previously made in the State and local banks, no deposit during this interval was made which required the reasons upon which it was directed to be communicated to Congress.

Without inquiring, in this place, whether under the charter the Bank of the United States had a right to such a transfer, I feel it my duty to state, that previous to the 1st day of January, 1817, a proposition had been submitted by this Department to the State and other local banks, for the purpose of inducing them to resume specie payments on the 20th day of February following. As the public money deposited in them was intimately connected with the proposition, it was deemed inexpedient to transfer those balances to the Bank of the United States until the result of the proposition was known.

Nearly contemporaneous with this event, an arrangement was made between the Bank of the United States and the State banks in the cities of New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Richmond, by which the deposits were to be transferred from the State banks embraced by the arrangement to the Bank of the United States and to its offices on the 20th day of February in that year. This arrangement was sanctioned by the Treasury Department, and was substantially executed by the parties.

As the conditions imposed by this arrangement upon the Bank of the United States were not extended to any other State or local banks than those which were parties to it, in order to induce the banks in this District to resume specie payments simultaneously with the banks already enumerated, it became necessary for the Treasury Department to give them assurances of support during the first months succeeding such resumption. In consequence of this assurance, a considerable portion of the deposits in the banks of Washington and Georgetown was permitted to remain until the 1st day of July last. On the 15th day of March of the same year, a deposit of $75,000 was made in the Farmers and Mechanics' Bank of Georgetown, which had not previously been one of the depositories of the public money; which sum was transferred to the Bank of the United States at the time that the deposits which had previously been made in the banks of Washington and Georgetown were transferred.

In the States south of this place, the deposits were transferred from the State banks to the offices of the Bank of the United States at the several periods of their commencing their operations.

Shortly after the office at Boston went into operation, a considerable portion of the public money deposited in the State banks was transferred, and paid in specie by that bank. Upon the urgent representations of the State banks, the remainder was assigned for the discharge of the Treasury notes which had been made payable at that place. Such portion of the sum set apart for that object as remained unexpended on the 1st day of July was directed to be paid to the office established at Boston.

Previously to the close of the year 1816, a considerable sum had been deposited in the Bank of Pennsylvania, to the credit of the Commissioner of Loans of the State of Pennsylvania, for the purpose of discharging the Treasury notes which had been made payable at Philadelphia. When the duties of Commissioner of Loans were transferred to the Bank of the United States, on the 1st day of July last, a considerable balance of that amount remained unexpended.

It was, however, represented by the Bank of Pennsylvania that Treasury notes were daily presented to it for payment, and that a transfer of the funds assigned to that object would be inconvenient to the holders; it was thereupon determined to continue to employ that bank as the agent of the Treasury for discharging the outstanding Treasury notes demandable at Philadelphia until the 1st day of October last, when the unexpended balance was directed to be transferred to the Bank of the United States.

By the regulations of the Bank of the United States, its officers were not permitted to receive the bills of any State or local banks except those established in the places where they were respectively tendered in payment. Under this regulation, the bills presented for deposit by the collector of the District of Columbia, and by several of those of the internal revenue of the States of Virginia and Maryland, to the office at this place, were refused.

The frequent repayments by officers of the late army on the final settlement of their accounts at the Treasury presented a difficulty of the same nature. In order to avoid the inconvenience of special deposits in this city, an arrangement was made with the Bank of the Metropolis, which has received all sums refused by the office in obedience to those regulations, and has credited the Treasurer of the United States with the amount in specie. The sums so paid remain still principally with the bank. Payments to some extent were also, on the same principle, made into the Bank of Pennsylvania, for some months after the Bank of the United States was in operation; but the sums so paid have been since transferred to the Bank of the United States.

No other cases have occurred during the recess of Congress which are necessary to be presented in this communication.

In declining to transfer the balances which remained in the banks of this District at the time that the office in this city commenced business, and in the cases stated to have occurred in Philadelphia and in Boston, I was influenced by a consideration of the pressure felt by the State and local banks during several months subsequent to the resumption of specie payments, and of the services rendered to the Government by those banks during the period that they were used as places of public deposit by the Treasury. An immediate transfer of the public money deposited in them would probably have produced a pressure upon the debtors of those banks, which might have inflicted upon them evils greatly beyond the benefit which would have resulted from that measure to the Bank of the United States.

In making transfers from the State banks, the special deposits, of which they were in some instances principally composed, presented considerable embarrassment. The Bank of the United States tendered its services for the purpose of exchanging for specie, or bills of the banks in the commercial cities, those deposits which were principally confined to the interior of the Middle and Western States. This offer was accepted; and although great exertions were made by the Bank to effect that object, much remains to be done. Indeed, the amount of special deposits is nearly as large as when the agency of the Bank was accepted. This has arisen from the immense number of local banks scattered over the interior of the States of Pennsylvania and Ohio, most of which ostensibly pay their bills in specie. The paper, however, of these banks is not received in most cases by each other as specie; and the experience which the Bank of the United States, in the execution of its agency, has acquired of the character and standing of many of them, has induced it generally to refuse the bills of those banks.

In order to put an end to an evil which seems rather to increase than to diminish, general instructions have been given to the collectors of the internal revenue to receive the bills of no bank which will not be credited as specie in the Bank of the United States, its offices, and State banks employed as places of deposit, where they are respectively required to make their deposits. As soon as the offices established at Louisville, Chillicothe and Pittsburg have gone into operation, and shall have thrown into circulation a reasonable amount of their bills, they will be made the sole depositories of the public money arising from the sale of lands in the States of Ohio and Indiana, and instructions similar to those already given to the collectors will be given to the receivers of public money in those States.

It is only after this arrangement shall be effected that the Bank of the United States will enjoy, in their just extent, the advantages intended to be secured to it by the charter. Under the limited enjoyment of those advantages, which general circumstances seemed to impose, the conduct of the Bank is entitled to high commendation. The directors have, in no instance, urged their claim to an earlier transfer of the public money which remained in the possession of the State and local banks. There is much reason, also, to believe, that in its intercourse with the State banks, and in the execution of the agency confided to it by this Department, a spirit of justice and liberality has been constantly manifested.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient servant,
WM. H. CRAWFORD.

HON. PRESIDENT OF THE SENATE.

MONDAY, December 15.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, presented the petition of Alfred M. Carter, of Tennessee, on behalf of himself and the other heirs of his deceased father, Landon Carter, praying payment for an unliquidated loan office certificate, for five hundred dollars, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BURRILL presented the petition of Joseph Aborn, surveyor of the port of Patuxet, within the district of Providence, in the State of Rhode Island, praying an increase of compensation, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BURRILL also presented the petition of Weaver Bennet, of Cranston, Rhode Island, praying compensation for services during the Revolutionary war, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what provisions are necessary to give effect to the laws of the United States, within the State of Mississippi.

On motion by Mr. LACOCK,

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the public buildings, be referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. DAGGETT, from the committee to whom was referred a resolution directing a distribution of certain laws, among the members of the Fifteenth Congress, reported it without amendment.

Mr. FISK, presented the petition of Silas Willard, of Barre, Vermont, praying the remission of a bond, forfeited to the United States, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TROUP submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate such information as he may possess, touching the execution of so much of the first article of the late Treaty of Peace and Amity between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, as relates to the restitution of slaves, and which has not heretofore been communicated.

DECEMBER, 1817.

SENATE.

On motion by Mr. NOBLE,
Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the militia, be referred to the Committee on the Militia.

On motion by Mr. TAIT,
Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to naval affairs, be referred to the Naval Committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Judiciary, which, having been amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law on the subject of bankruptcies or insolvency. Also, that the aforesaid committee inquire into the expediency of further provision by law, for the punishment of offences committed in places within the exclusive jurisdiction of the United States. Also, into the necessity of further defining piracy, and other offences committed on the high seas, and into any defects existing in the laws of the United States for the punishment of crimes and offences.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of dividing the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts, and establishing a district and circuit court of the United States at Pittsburg, in the county of Allegheny; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, that so much of the President's Message as relates to roads and inland navigation, and seminaries of learning, be referred to a select committee, and agreed thereto; and Messrs. LACOCK, KING, BARBOUR, OTIS, and MORROW, were appointed the committee.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to the Senate, such information as he may possess, and which the public interest will permit him to disclose, relative to our pending negotiation with Spain.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, that so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the public lands, be referred to the Committee on Public Lands; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, that so much of the Message of the President of the United States, as relates to the surviving officers and soldiers of our Revolutionary Army, be referred to the Committee on Pensions; and agreed thereto.

The bill entitled "An act supplementary to the act establishing the Mint, and the act concerning the Mint," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to abolish the internal duties," reported it with amendments which were read, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in by the Senate, the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

Mr. DAGGETT, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution authorizing the distribution of certain public documents, reported it with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for perpetuating certain land marks; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, that the memorials of the commissioned officers of the Mediterranean squadron, and of the marine officers, then in the Mediterranean, representing certain grievances, be referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs; and agreed thereto.

TUESDAY, December 16.

ISHAM TALBOT, from the State of Kentucky, arrived the 15th instant, and attended this day.

Mr. WILSON presented the memorials of a number of persons residing in the State of Pennsylvania, praying that the internal duties may be abolished, for reasons stated in the memorials; which were read.

Mr. LEAKE presented the memorial of the Mississippi Convention on the subject of certain land claims, and praying some legislative provision in relation thereto; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. LEAKE also presented another memorial from the same convention, praying an extension of the limits of that State, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to a select committee to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. LEAKE, TROUP, and WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, were appointed the committee.

Mr. TICHENOR presented the petition of Ephraim Shuler, De La Fayette Wilcox, and Alphonso Wetmore, first lieutenants of the sixth regiment United States infantry, stating, that during the late war, while engaged in action with the enemy, they received several severe wounds, which have occasioned to each the loss of an arm, and praying pensions in consideration thereof; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. MORROW submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of prohibiting any location or surveys being made under military land warrants, on lands in the Virginia military tract, to which the Indian title has not been extinguished, for a period of — months, after the ratification of any treaty formed for the extinguishment of such title. And also, that they inquire what provision should be made for extending and fixing a boundary line between the lands aforesaid and the public lands of the United States.

On motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Aborn, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, presented the representation of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, respecting the grants of lands in that State, by the State of North Carolina; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. MORROW submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire whether any, and if any, what Legislative provision is necessary to be made, for ascertaining and establishing the northern boundary line of the State of Ohio; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 15th instant, that the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire what provisions are necessary to give effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Mississippi; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 15th instant, for information touching the execution of so much of the first article of the late Treaty of Peace and Amity, between His Britannic Majesty and the United States of America, as relates to the restitution of slaves; which has not heretofore been communicated; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 15th instant, for requesting the President of the United States to communicate information relative to our pending negotiation with Spain; and agreed thereto.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to abolish the internal duties," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution directing a distribution of certain laws among the members of the Fifteenth Congress; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and it was ordered to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution authorizing the distribution of certain public documents, together with the amendments reported thereto, which having been amended were agreed to, and the PRESIDENT reported the resolution to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

COLLECTION OF DUTIES.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of Mr. SANFORD, of the 5th instant, directing the Committee on Finance, to make inquiry relative to the collection of ad valorem duties on importations.

Mr. SANFORD rose and addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President: According to the laws now in force, the duties on merchandise imported are of two classes; those which are usually denominated specific; and those which are imposed on the value. The specific duty is charged upon the article, according to some denomination, or quantity; and is determined by the number, weight, or measure of the article; as cigars, by the thousand, teas and sugars, by the pound; wines and spirits, by the gallon, or salt, by the bushel. The duty on the value is a certain proportion of the value; as ten or twenty per centum. The ad valorem duties are calculated, not upon any value which the merchandise may bear, but upon its actual cost in the foreign country from which it came, with an addition of twenty per centum to the cost, if imported from places beyond the Cape of Good Hope, and ten per centum if imported from any other place.

The foreign cost of merchandise is, therefore, the basis of the ad valorem duties; and that cost must be ascertained, in order to ascertain the duties. This principle having been adopted, the provisions of the existing system for the collection of these duties were devised, in order to carry it into effect.

Where the duty is specific, the quantity of goods is ascertained by a public officer, by actual enumeration; weighing, gauging, or measuring, before the goods are delivered to the owner or consignee. Where the duty is on the value, the foreign cost is determined, for the purpose of charging the duty upon it in ordinary cases, by the owner of the goods, or by his consignee, or agent representing him. This is done by an entry of the goods at the custom-house, by the owner, consignee, or agent, who at the same time produces the invoice and bill of lading attending the importation. The entry and the invoice state the prices or cost of the goods, and the person making the entry swears that they are true. When this has been done, the goods are, in ordinary cases, without any farther investigation, concerning their value or cost, delivered to the owner or his agent; and the foreign cost, thus obtained, is the basis upon which the duties are computed.

From the slightest view it is apparent that this method of determining the cost of goods subject to duty on the value, is exceedingly liable to evasion, by untrue statements of the foreign cost upon which the duty is charged. The cost is determined, in most cases, merely by the person who is to pay the duty. The party required to pay the duty; the party whose profit or loss must always depend wholly, or in part, upon the amount of duty charged and paid on the goods; the party interested to reduce the duty as much as possible, is allowed to make his own statement of the cost: and this cost, so stated, is, in most cases, the sum upon which the duties are calculated and paid. Of all temptations to undervalue merchandise, it does not seem possible to devise one more direct and dangerous than to give to the party who is to state the value all the benefit of an undervaluation.

The present system for the collection of these duties, however, contains provisions which seem to have been considered sufficient, when the system was adopted, to secure the revenue against the effects of danger so obvious and great as that of allowing the party interested, the owner of the goods, or his agent, to determine the sum upon which the ad valorem duties shall be paid. The securities, and the remedies provided by the present system, are these:

1. An entry of the goods must be made by the importer, consignee, or agent. The invoice is to be produced at the time of making the entry. The invoice and the entry state the cost of the goods; and the person who makes the entry, takes an oath that they are true, and contain a just account of the cost.

2. If the merchandise shall not be invoiced according to its actual cost at the place of exportation, with design to evade any part of the duties, the goods, or the value of them, shall be forfeited.

3. If the collector shall suspect that the goods are invoiced at a sum less than that for which they have been usually sold in the foreign country from which they came, he may retain them until an appraisement shall have taken place; when they have been appraised, the duties shall be paid upon the appraised value.

Such are the provisions of the present system applicable to this subject. It is believed, that in fact, and in practice, these provisions are now entirely inadequate to the object of securing fair and just valuations, as the basis of the ad valorem duties.

It seems to have been supposed by the authors of the present system of collection, that the invoice which would appear at the custom-house would be an instrument prepared by the foreign seller of the goods, and transmitted by him to the purchaser or importer, who would produce it upon making his entry. Such an invoice, which is a bill of parcels and prices really furnished by the foreign seller, is, undoubtedly, often produced at the custom-house. But, in the present course of trade, a very great part of the merchandise subject to ad valorem duties, which is now imported, comes attended by invoices prepared in a very different manner.

In many cases the goods are purchased by a partner or agent, who is sent to Europe, or employed there for that purpose. The partner or agent purchases from the foreign manufacturers or merchants, as opportunities are favorable; and often in different parcels, at different times; and perhaps from several persons at different prices. The goods intended for one consignment are collected into one parcel, and it is said that a new invoice of that consignment is prepared by the partner or agent, and sent with the goods to this country.

Another large part of these goods is now sent to this country by foreign merchants, for sale on their own account. In this case, the goods are purchased from manufacturers, or other merchants, and invoices may pass between the foreign seller and the foreign buyer. But it is understood that the invoices which accompany the goods to this country, are prepared by the merchant who exports the goods, and are of course adapted to his own views and objects.

Another very considerable part of these goods is now sent to the United States by the foreign manufacturers, for sale on their account. In this case the only purchase made by the manufacturer was of the raw material; and the goods have not yet been sold or bought, in their manufactured state. The manufacturer, therefore, thinks himself quite at liberty to place any value he pleases upon his own labor and industry, which have been applied to the raw material. He accordingly prepares an invoice, expressing the value or cost at the lowest sum which he thinks likely to pass the custom-house at the port of importation.

In all these cases, the invoices exhibited at the custom-house do not proceed from any foreign seller of the goods. They are not prepared for any of those objects which are usual or necessary between merchant and merchant, between vendor and purchaser, or between creditor and debtor; but they are, in truth, prepared and sent for the sole purpose of being used at the custom-house, to establish the sum upon which the duties shall be paid; and they are of course adapted to that object.

If in any of these cases the consignor of the goods thinks it expedient to furnish his agent or partner here, with directions concerning the terms upon which the goods are to be sold, he does so. These directions are sometimes given in the form of an invoice, stating the true cost or value of the goods upon which the partner or agent here may be instructed to require a certain advance when he sells. This other invoice is intended, if I may use a cant phrase, to sell by, and not to enter by. As the first invoice is intended for the custom-house, the second is intended for the private use of the partner or agent here, to show him how much the goods really cost, and to be shown by him to those who may desire to purchase, and may wish to know the true foreign cost of the goods. But as the consignee, who is furnished with two different invoices, and produces only one of them to the custom-house, is exposed to the charge of perjury, other courses, free from that danger, are frequently pursued. Instead of a second invoice, the consignee is sometimes furnished with an account of the goods, which does not state their foreign cost at all, but states the prices at which the owner is willing to sell them in this country. This account is entirely silent in respect to the foreign cost of the goods, and expresses nothing contradictory to the invoice of the foreign cost, exhibited at the custom-house. Another course frequently taken, is to send the invoice, which expresses the true cost, to a third person, who is also an agent of the consignor, with instruction and authority to demand and receive the goods from the consignee, who makes the entry, after the goods shall have passed through the forms of the custom-house. The second agent thus obtains possession of the goods, while the true invoice of their cost never was in possession of the consignee, who made the entry.

The proofs of the foreign cost, given by the importer, are his entry, his invoice, and his oath. The invoice is a full account of the particular goods composing the consignment, with their foreign prices. The entry, the form of which is prescribed by law, contains a brief statement of the foreign cost, corresponding with the invoice. It is always made in conformity to the invoice, and always states the amount of the cost, as it is stated in the invoice. The oath is also in a prescribed form. It is, in substance, that the invoice and entry are true. When this oath is taken at the custom-house, no question is asked; no inquiry or examination, beyond the oath, takes place, and no farther disclosure whatever is required from the person making the entry, concerning the value or cost of the goods, or concerning any matter stated in the invoice, entry, or oath. After the goods have been entered in this manner, the invoice is returned to the person who produced it, and the entry and the oath remain in the custom-house.

Thus, the foreign cost of the goods is determined by the oath of the person making the entry, for everything rests upon his oath. The cost is, indeed, stated in the entry; but there is no proof that the entry is true, excepting the oath. The cost is also specified in the invoice; but the only proof that the invoice is true, is the oath. The invoice, indeed, specifies the particular articles, and their prices, in detail; but these specifications might be comprised in the entry or in the oath. The entry, the invoice, and the oath, taken together, amount to no more, in effect, than a declaration, upon oath, that the goods cost a certain sum of money. If the cost were stated in the oath itself, the oath would possess all the intrinsic weight which can now be attributed to the entry, the invoice, and the oath united; since, if the invoice and entry are true, the oath specifying the cost would be true, without them; and, if they are false, the oath is false.

The oath taken upon making the entry, also contains a promise that, if the person making the entry shall afterwards receive any invoice different from that exhibited, he will report it to the collector. This promissory part of the oath is useless in practice. No other invoice is reported; and if a second invoice should be produced, the present system is destitute of proper provisions to verify it, or to obtain the duties upon the cost stated in it. The goods pass the custom-house, and go into the possession of the owner, or his agent, immediately after they are entered, and the duties upon the first invoice are paid or secured.

Still it seems to have been supposed, that some additional security to the revenue is afforded by an invoice, independently of an oath, or any other evidence, to show that the invoice is genuine.

It is only upon this supposition, that we can account for the importance ascribed to invoices, in the present system of collection. The owner of the goods must know the price which he gave for them; and he might be required to state that price either without or with an invoice. When an invoice arrives in this country, there is evidently no other tie upon the person who holds it, to produce it at the custom-house, excepting the sanction of the oath which he is required to take. That sanction, if sufficient to bring forth the true invoice, would be equally sufficient to bring forth a true account of the cost, without the invoice. If the importer were required to produce his ledger, in order to show the prices paid or the cost with which he had charged himself, the security to the revenue would not consist in the name of the document required or furnished, but would depend entirely upon the oath which would be employed as a test to discriminate between a true and a false ledger. It, therefore, seems evident that, excepting the provisions of forfeiture and appraisement, which will be considered in the sequel, the efficacy of the present method of determining the foreign cost, depends altogether upon the efficacy of the oath taken upon making the entry.

When the perjury is committed, by swearing that a fictitious invoice is true, the danger of legal punishment is much less than in most cases of perjury. The merchandise was purchased in a foreign country, the price was paid in a foreign country, and the invoice was probably prepared in that country. The fact in question, is, what price was really paid for the merchandise in the foreign country. From the course of the transaction, and the nature of the fact in question, the testimony requisite to maintain a criminal prosecution for perjury can very seldom be obtained in this country. It is improbable that a parcel of merchandise should be purchased in a foreign country, for half of its value; but it still may be a fact that it was so purchased. To support a prosecution for perjury, it must be proved that the merchandise was not purchased at the price stated in the invoice. If the merchandise was, in truth, purchased at any other price, the proof of that fact could, in general, be found only in the foreign country where the purchase was made. In general therefore, the only proof of a false statement of the cost in the invoice which can be offered in this country, is the improbability of the cost stated, resulting from the apparent disproportion between the foreign value and the foreign cost stated. The presumptive evidence can hardly be sufficient to induce a conviction for perjury, and the crime must generally pass unpunished, not because it has not been committed, but because, from the nature of the case, the proofs requisite to inflict punishment can seldom be obtained.

But it is by no means true, that perjury is always committed where an entry is made upon a false invoice. By the regulations of the present system, the entry of the goods may be made by the owner, consignee, or agent. Where the owner of the goods himself makes the entry, produces a false invoice, and takes the oath prescribed, he plainly commits perjury. In this case, as the owner of the goods must know their cost, and as the only object of an undervaluation in the invoice is to obtain an advantage to the owner, the false invoice must necessarily have been prepared or procured by him, and its falsehood must be known to him.

But where the entry is made by a consignee or agent, who is not himself the owner of the goods, the case is very different in this respect. The consignee or agent, in this case, knows nothing, or may know nothing, of the invoice, except that it is sent to him as genuine and true. He therefore makes the entry upon the invoice which he has received, and takes the oath, stating, in substance, that the invoice produced is the true and only invoice which he has received, and that he has no knowledge of any other invoice or account of the goods, different from that produced. The consignee or agent who makes this use of an invoice, and takes this oath concerning it, is considered as incurring neither legal guilt nor public censure, inasmuch as he is supposed not to know the real cost of the goods, and, if the cost is falsely stated, the benefit of an undervaluation is not for himself, but for others.

The present system leaves the owner of goods, which are about to be imported into the United States, at perfect freedom to consign the goods, or cause them to be consigned, to himself or to any other person. Goods are frequently sent to a consignee or agent here, who is not the owner, in the ordinary course of commerce, and without any view to the duties on the importation. Where the goods are sent to this country by a foreign manufacturer, or a foreign merchant, for sale, on his own account, the consignment is, of course, made to some person, who is a mere agent of the foreign owner. But the consignment may be to an agent in every case; any importation may be made in that manner; and this may be done as well when the owner is in this country as when he is a resident of a foreign country. It is therefore in the power of any owner of goods which are to be imported into the United States, to consign them, or direct that they shall be consigned, to a person, or agent, who has no knowledge of the foreign cost of goods, who knows nothing of any invoice, except that which is sent to him, and who may, without perjury, enter the goods, and take the oath required at the custom-house.

Thus the owner of goods about to be imported may, in his own pleasure, cause the consignment to be made in such a manner, that the entry of the goods shall be made upon a false invoice, by another person, as consignee. The consignee knows nothing of the foreign cost of the goods, and therefore is supposed not to commit perjury. Yet his oath is received, and allowed to verify the invoice, stating the foreign cost, upon which the duties are charged. The invoice, and the foreign cost expressed in it, are established by an oath; but the penalties of perjury are completely eluded. But it was foreseen that the oath of an agent, who is a stranger, is the material fact; the foreign cost, concerning which he swears, would afford no security to the revenue. The law, therefore, provides, that when the entry shall be made by an agent, factor, or person other than the owner, or other than the person to whom the goods are ultimately consigned, a bond shall be taken that the real owner shall himself furnish an entry or account of the goods upon oath. But this provision presents no difficulty in practice to those who choose to pay duties merely upon the entry and oath of an agent. Where such is the object, care is taken not to express any secondary or ulterior consignment of the goods to a third person, in the papers exhibited at the custom-house. The only papers required to be produced upon making the entry are the bill of lading and the invoice. These express a consignment in general terms, not distinguishing whether the consignee is the owner of the goods, or the agent, factor, or representative of the owner. At the custom-house no question is put to the person making the entry, no information is required from him beyond the well known forms established by law, and no other disclosure is required respecting the owner of the goods, or their farther destination. The consignee named in the invoice and bill of lading thus stands as the person to whom the goods are ultimately consigned. It does not appear from these documents whether he is owner or agent; no investigation is authorized or allowed, to ascertain whether he is the owner of the goods or not; his oath establishes the invoice which he offers, and upon the cost stated in that invoice the duties are taken. Another device, which is supposed to secure the parties concerned from the charge of perjury, is now frequently practised. Two agents are employed here by the consignor who sends the goods to this country. The goods are consigned to the first agent, with all the usual commercial documents, and among them is an invoice stating the foreign cost of the goods far below the truth. The consignee enters the goods upon this invoice, which is the only invoice received by him. He is, however, instructed to hold the goods, subject to the order of the second agent, and to deliver them to him when they shall be demanded. The second agent is furnished with another invoice, expressing the true foreign cost of the goods; and he is authorized and instructed to receive the goods from the first agent, after the duties shall have been adjusted. The duties are accordingly paid or secured at the custom-house upon the false invoice produced by the first agent; and the goods are immediately delivered over to the second agent, who holds the true invoice. By this legerdemain the duties are paid on a false invoice; the owner of the goods has, through his second agent, the use of a true invoice for every purpose, excepting that of paying duties upon it; and nobody is supposed to commit perjury in this course of proceeding.

The provision, that the goods or their value shall be forfeited, if they are invoiced at less than their actual cost, would seem in theory to be a strong security against this species of fraud; and if the loss of the property, or the value of it, were really and certainly to follow the offence, the penalty would be very adequate to the object. But in practice this provision is found to be almost wholly inoperative. Frequent as the fact of false invoices undoubtedly is, it is seldom that a prosecution for such a forfeiture is instituted; and where such prosecutions have been instituted, scarcely an instance is known where one has been successful. The allegation upon which such a prosecution proceeds is, that the goods were invoiced at less than their actual cost at the place of exportation. This fact is, from its nature, exceedingly difficult to be established in this country, by proofs on the part of the prosecution. It may be true that the importer purchased the goods in Europe for one-third of their value; for, though such a case may be rare, it may occur. No witness can be found in this country who is able to say negatively that the goods were not in fact purchased for one-third of their value. In general, therefore, these prosecutions rest wholly upon the apparent inadequacy of price, or the supposed disparity between the foreign value and the foreign cost stated in the invoice. This evidence, resulting from this disparity, is also frequently uncertain on account of the uncertainty of the foreign value. It is at best only presumptive; and, unless the disparity is excessive, is considered scarcely sufficient to establish a charge of fraud. But these prosecutions are generally decided upon proofs produced by the claimant or defendant resisting the forfeiture. The question being what the goods cost in a foreign country, the proofs of that fact must come from that country. The course of proceeding in the prosecution for the forfeiture of the goods, or their value, is, that the claimant or defendant obtains a commission from the court to take the testimony of witnesses in the foreign place from which the goods came. The commission is sent to examine his witnesses, who are to prove the actual cost; and their testimony is taken in writing, and transmitted to the court here. Generally, the witnesses do not fail to give testimony, the goods were truly invoiced according to their actual cost. There is very seldom any positive evidence in contradiction to this testimony, and the court, proceeding upon legal proofs, decides against the prosecution. Thus the question is decided upon testimony appearing fair, indeed, upon paper, but given by witnesses in a foreign country, who may be unworthy of credit, and who at least testify in a manner which does not subject them to the punishment of perjury. Is it surprising that an importer, who has himself committed perjury in making his own entry, should find witnesses in the foreign country who will support his oath with theirs, and prove whatever may be requisite to insure success to the fraud? And it is very natural that the officers of the customs, finding it almost fruitless to make seizures or institute prosecutions for this cause, should seldom attempt them. Nor is there any fault in the courts of law in this respect.

The difficulties which obstruct the operation of this provision of forfeiture result from the system itself. The price given for the goods in a foreign country being taken as a basis for the ad valorem duties, it is unavoidable that the proofs of that price should, in contested cases, be drawn from that country; and if there is danger of perjury in making proof of the fact in the first instance here, the danger of that crime is far greater when the proofs are to be obtained from the foreign country.

The provision that, when the collector shall suspect that the merchandise is not invoiced at the price usual at the place of exportation, he may require an appraisement, would also seem to promise a security against the fraud in question. This provision, though useful in practice, to some extent, is also believed to fall very far short of an adequate remedy. It is insufficient to prevent or correct the fraud of false invoices and entries, for many reasons.

1. It is a power to be exercised when the collector shall suspect fraud. He may exercise it or not, at pleasure.

2. The collector in general derives no personal benefit from increasing the duties of an appraisement. His commissions upon the duties, in any particular case, are, of course, increased by increasing the duties in that case. But, as the amount of the collector's emoluments is limited, and as, in several districts, the ordinary emoluments exceed the amount limited, the additional commissions, in such particular cases, in those districts, may be considered as a part of the excess, and belonging, in effect, to the public, and not to the collector. And in all the districts, as the effect of severity, on the part of the collector is, to turn the importations into some other district where more gentle treatment is received, he will probably lose more by diminishing the total amount of importations into his district than he will gain by increasing the duties upon some particular importations. So far, then, as the personal interest of the collectors is concerned in the exercise of this power, it appears that some of them can gain nothing, and that, in general, they are more likely to lose than to gain by requiring appraisements.

3. The collector cannot require an appraisement until an entry has been made. To require an appraisement after an entry, is to allege, in the most direct manner, that the entry was fraudulent, and to advance a charge of perjury, in some cases, and of fraud in all. It must be at least disagreeable to the collector to select particular persons, and particular cases, as the objects of such a charge.

4. When an appraisement takes place, it is made by two persons, one of whom is chosen by the collector, and the other by the owner of the goods. The law, indeed, directs that these two persons shall be reputable merchants; but there can be no investigation to ascertain whether they are, or either of them is, reputable, or indifferent, or incompetent. The appraiser appointed by the importer may be his secret partner, his agent, or his friend; or he may be, as his constituent who made the entry often is, a foreign agent, employed in the importation of goods, and in entering them at the custom-house, on account of foreigners. The collector cannot object to him for any reason whatever. In general, the appraiser appointed by the collector may be impartial. The appraiser appointed by the owner of the goods is always at least his firm friend, and very often his real agent.

5. To make a just valuation, it would frequently be necessary that the appraisers should give some time and considerable attention and trouble to the object of their appointment. No compensation is allowed by law to the appraisers for their services. Of course, they receive nothing from the public; and if they, or either of them, receive any compensation, it is from the other party, the importer, who is at liberty to act in this respect as his own interest may dictate.

6. No person is obliged to act as an appraiser. Hence the appraiser appointed by the collector frequently declines to act, the merchants who are most respectable and most competent being often unwilling to engage in these odious investigations. The appraiser selected by the importer is always ready to act; and the collector must either find a person who is willing to act with him, or he must abandon the proposed appraisement, and submit to take the duties upon the invoice and the entry already made.

7. There is no provision for the case of a disagreement between the two appraisers. Either of the appraisers may therefore prevent an appraisement by insisting on a valuation to which the other will not accede. If no appraisement is made, the duties are taken upon the invoice; consequently it is in the power of the appraiser appointed by the importer to prevent any valuation which shall exceed the invoice; and, if such disagreements between appraisers have not often happened, the reason is, that in most cases, their appraisements have not exceeded the invoices in question.

8. The appraisers are required to determine, not what the goods are worth here, but what they cost in the foreign country from which they came. This is often a question of real difficulty. The state of the foreign market, at a particular time, may, in some cases, be known with much exactness. In many others, it is entirely unknown, or known very imperfectly. In all cases the appraisers have an unlimited latitude to adopt any proofs, information, or opinions concerning the foreign value or price which may be acceptable to them.

9. From the considerations stated, it is perhaps not surprising that the goods are frequently appraised at the very lowest sum for which they could possibly, in any circumstances, have been purchased in the foreign country. This, indeed, is the best result for the public which can be expected from this proceeding. More generally, the appraisers, by their valuation, confirm the invoice. In some cases they make inconsiderable additions to it, and in some others they appraise the goods at a less sum than the cost stated in the invoice.

10. Thus the importer, who wishes to evade a part of the duties, attains his object in one way or the other. If his invoice passes without an appraisement, he pays duties on the cost which he has stated. If an appraisement takes place, the duties are paid on the appraised value, which is never high, always very moderate, generally very low, rarely exceeding the invoice, and sometimes less than the invoice. In either case he pays duties on a value less than that which he gave for the goods.

11. As the invoice is usually confirmed by the appraisement, unless the undervaluation is very exorbitant, the importer is able to judge what reduction, from the true value, he may safely venture to make in the invoice; and the collector may not think it expedient to require an appraisement, where there is no reason to suppose that the public will gain anything by that measure.

12. From these, or other causes, the cases in which appraisements are required by the collectors, are comparatively but few. In addition to the legal power of the collectors, they have been instructed by the Treasury to exercise that power freely, and to require an appraisement wherever there might be reason to suspect too low a valuation in the invoice. Still the power is, in fact, not often exercised, so far as is known: and by far the greatest part of the ad valorem duties is computed and received upon the cost stated in the invoice presented by the owner of the goods, or his agent.

Upon the whole of this part of the subject, it is conceived, that the power of the collector to require an appraisement, though it may operate, in some degree, to prevent great and flagrant undervaluations, is a very partial and ineffectual restraint upon the smaller undervaluations of five, ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty, forty, and fifty, per centum less than the just value, or cost, of the goods. And there is no doubt that the frauds of this kind, from which the revenue suffers most, are false valuations of the latter class; in which the cost expressed in the invoice is less than the real cost by ten, fifteen, twenty, twenty-five, thirty, or forty per centum. It is in these cases that an actual appraisement seldom takes place. When, in these cases, an appraisement does take place, little or nothing is gained by it; and sometimes the value is reduced by the appraisement below the cost stated in the invoice.

Such is the course of things where an invoice is furnished to the custom-house. But it often happens that no invoice is produced. This occurs in two cases: first, where the invoice is really lost, or is not received by the owner, consignee, or agent; and, secondly, where, though the invoice has been received, the person holding it chooses to suppress it, and to pretend that it has been lost or not received. In either case, the course of proceeding is the same. The goods are to remain in the public store until the invoice shall be produced, or an appraisement shall take place; and the owner or agent has the option to select either alternative. He, of course, chooses an appraisement, which accordingly takes place. The appraisement is made in the same manner as in the case where an invoice is produced and an appraisement is required by the collector. Two persons are appointed, one by the collector, and the other by the owner or agent; these two appraisers determine the foreign value or cost as they think proper; and the duties are then taken upon their appraisement. In this case, there is no charge of fraud in furnishing a false invoice. With this exception, it is evident that all the difficulties, objections, and abuses, which occur in appraisements required by the collector, must also occur, as they do in fact in this case, where an appraisement is required by the importer.

Our law requires that the invoice shall be produced where there is one; but we have no law requiring that the importation shall be attended by an invoice. The only consequence of the want of an invoice is an appraisement; and the advantages of an appraisement to the importer, under the present system, have been stated, and are well known. If the person making the entry swears that he has not received an invoice, when he has in truth received one, which he suppresses, he clearly commits perjury. But it is not at all necessary to expose any of the parties to the perils of this crime. It is in the power of the owner or shipper abroad to send no invoice at all; to withhold the invoice until an appraisement shall have taken place, or to send it to another friend, who may withhold it from the consignee, until an appraisement shall have taken place; or he may direct the consignee to hold the goods until further orders; or he may give an authority to his other friend and agent to demand and receive the goods after the duties shall have been adjusted; or he may direct the consignee to sell the goods at auction. In any of these cases the goods may come to the consignee unaccompanied with any invoice; for want of an invoice they are appraised, and the advantages of that proceeding to the owner are obtained, while no charge of turpitude is supposed to fall upon any of the parties concerned, who, though they have deviated a little from the ordinary course of commerce, have still transacted their business entirely within the limits of the revenue laws.

Thus the foreign costs of the goods is determined, in all cases, either by the person making the entry or by an appraisement; and such is the operation, in practice, of these two modes of determining the sum upon which the ad valorem duties are paid.

The general result of these facts and views is as follows:

1. An invoice of the foreign cost is no security to the revenue.
2. The foreign cost is determined by the oath of the person who makes the entry, in all cases, excepting those in which there is an appraisement.
3. Where there is an appraisement, that proceeding is subject to abuses, greatly injurious to the revenue; which have been stated.

4. The oath required upon making the entry, in order to determine the foreign cost, is no security whatever to the revenue, where the person making the entry is not the owner of the goods. The persons who make entries of goods belonging to others are supposed not to commit perjury; many of them are really ignorant of the foreign cost which their oaths are, nevertheless, allowed to establish; and they are all able to say of this proceeding, in the words of Hamlet, that it is as easy as lying.

5. The penalties of perjury and the forfeiture of the goods are almost inoperative in practice, on account of legal difficulties, and the necessity of resorting to a foreign country to prove the true foreign cost.

6. The checks and remedies for false statements of the foreign cost, provided by the present system, when they operate in practice at all, serve, in general, to prevent or correct only the extreme and most palpable cases of undervaluation, leaving all others to be the prey of unrestrained fraud.

Besides the fraud of false invoices, the present system is exposed to the danger of true invoices, founded upon fictitious sales in a foreign country. Nor is this danger merely imaginary, for instances are known in which sham sales have been made in another country, for the sole purpose of fixing the cost of goods about to be imported into this country. This has been done, particularly in Lower Canada; and goods have even been sold, ostensibly, at public auction, with all the ceremony, and circumstances, and witnesses, usually attending a public sale, for the mere object of establishing a sum upon which our duties should be paid; in such a manner, that, if the price stated should be contested here, the importer might have it in his power to furnish proofs of a sale and purchase at the price stated. This proceeding is, indeed, nothing more than another mode of disguising the real foreign cost of the goods, and could not prevail here if the whole truth should appear. But it is because the whole truth of the real cost, and the fictitious sale can very seldom appear here, that this disguise is not detected, and the artifice has its intended effect upon our duties.

Other minor evasions and falsehoods in invoices occur in practice under the present system of assessing the ad valorem duties on the foreign cost, as stated in the invoice; the recital of which would be too prolix for the present occasion. The most important of these is the practice of disguising a part of the real foreign price of the goods, under the names of commissions, discounts, and other charges, which are deducted from the nominal amount of the invoice; for, by our law, the duty is calculated on the net cost of the goods, excluding such charges.

A very great part, perhaps about one-half, of all the articles subjected to duty on the value, which we import, are manufactures of wool and cotton. In these articles, in which the efforts of art and industry make great and very various additions to the value of the raw material, the fraud of false statements of the foreign cost is facilitated by the difference of fabrics and the variety of values. This fraud is accordingly practised in these articles to a great extent.

It is more particularly since the termination of the late war with Great Britain that the practice of sending goods to the United States to be sold here, on account of the foreign owner, has been carried to a very great extent. The consignment is made to a person here, who, by whatever name he may be called, is, in truth and effect, a mere agent of the owner of the goods. A suitable person for this agency is sent or selected, who makes the entry, pays the duties, and disposes of the goods for the benefit of his principal. This is the history of many great importations which have been made within the last three years, and which have indeed paid duties to the Treasury, but have paid much less than they should have done. Immense quantities of goods, subject to ad valorem duties, are sent to this country by foreigners, to be entered at the custom-house and pay duties, for account of foreigners, and finally to be sold here, in the first instance, on account of foreigners. The course of proceeding is well understood. The consignee or agent is not supposed to commit his conscience or his character in producing the invoice and making the entry. The principal has only to take care not to grasp too much. If he will content himself with any deduction from the true value of the goods which is not palpably excessive, his invoice, in all probability, passes without objection. If an appraisement is required, the value stated in the invoice is little, or not at all, increased. In either case the foreign owner, who is beyond the reach of our laws, and who has no other object but to obtain the most money for his goods, attains his object, and makes a very important saving in the duties. Where the ad valorem duties are considerable, as ours now are, varying from seven and a half to thirty per centum upon the foreign cost; where, upon the greatest part of the articles, the duties are twenty and twenty-five per centum; and where a considerable part of these duties may be saved by a course of proceeding well understood, and free from legal perils; a course of proceeding which is not only practised, but, under the present system, is easily practicable, it is not wonderful that the course should be pursued which will secure the advantage.

These great importations by foreigners, on their own account, have produced important consequences. They have demonstrated more fully than had been done before, that it is both practicable and easy, under the present system of collection, to evade a considerable part of the duties. They have been the principal cause, it is apprehended, of the very great sales at auction, especially of British manufactures, which have taken place within the period mentioned. The foreign owner, being desirous to obtain the returns of his merchandise as soon as possible, from a country in which he has no establishment, directs it to be sold at auction as soon as it has passed through the forms of the custom-house. At auction it may sometimes sell for less than at private sale; but the difference is far more than compensated by the saving made in the duties. In a few months he finds his funds replaced to him, and he is ready to repeat the operation. These importations have also, in a great degree, destroyed the business of our own importing merchants. The illicit advantages which the foreigner abroad, and his agent here, obtain in the duties, enable them to undersell our own merchants, who import in the former course of business, and make true entries, upon true invoices. These advantages, enjoyed by the foreigner and his agent, being ascertained, operate as a new cause, producing further importations; which also take the course of those which preceded them. It is in these advantages that we find the principal cause of the revolution which has taken place in the course of this trade, and of the successful competition of foreigners against our own citizens in the importation of these goods. Thus, our own merchants are driven from their business by the fraudulent competition of strangers; a change has taken place in the course and manner of a great part of our importations, and this course of things is facilitated and encouraged by our present system of collecting the ad valorem duties.

I am sensible that a peculiar state of things in Great Britain, in 1815 and 1816, contributed much to augment the exportation of British manufactures to this country. The low prices of those manufactures, and the necessity of finding a vent for them, induced the holders to send them to this country, where they expected an advantageous market. The prices being really low, appeared so in the invoices, which were genuine, and because the prices were really reduced, and were, for some time, in a course of decline; these facts served as a convenient pretence for stating them still lower than they really were, in the invoices, which were fictitious. And there is good reason to believe that when the foreign holders of these manufactures had ascertained the success of their sales and savings in this country, they continued, from the ordinary motives of commerce, a course of trade, which, though commenced in some degree from temporary causes, had been found, by experience, to insure them a very decided advantage in the competition with the American importer.

Where one of our own merchants is the importer, and where he himself produces the invoice and makes the entry as the owner of the goods, it is believed that perjury or fraud very seldom takes place. He is deterred not only by the danger of legal punishment, but still more, by the moral restraints which surround him. The horrid nature of the crime of perjury, his religion, his moral sense, his own character, and the salutary control of public opinion, are all restraints which he feels in their proper force. The fair and pure character of our own merchants, as a body, certainly forbids the idea that they are capable of these frauds; and there is no reason to suppose that they participate in them. It is because they do not participate in them that they suffer by them. If our own merchants had continued to be, as they heretofore were, the importers of these goods subject to ad valorem duties, the present system of collection, imperfect as it is, might have been sufficient, for integrity and honor would have supplied the place, and would have had the force of legal regulations.

It is obvious to all that a transient foreigner, the mere factor of a foreign merchant or manufacturer, is not bound to our country or its laws, by the force of morality, honor, personal character, and public opinion, those silken ties of society, in the same manner and to the same extent as an established merchant of our own country. But I mean no illiberal imputation against foreigners in general, or those of any particular country. But I mean that profligate men are found in other countries and sent to this, to act as agents, and carry foreign merchandise through the forms of our custom-houses, while they themselves are unknown to our citizens, unestablished in our country, without reputation at hazard, appearing to-day and disappearing to-morrow, and free from those moral restraints and responsibilities which operate so powerfully upon the merchant who is known and has a fixed residence in any society. These are the men whose oaths determine what duties shall be paid to our Treasury; these are the men, who, with their principals and partners, are the competitors of our own merchants; and by these men it is that our merchants and manufacturers are rendered the victims of a fraudulent competition.

It would be interesting to ascertain accurately what proportion of the goods subject to ad valorem duties is imported by our own citizens, and what proportion by foreigners, or on account of foreigners; what part is entered by the real owners, and what part by agents of real owners. But these facts cannot be ascertained from the Treasury or from the custom-houses. The national character of the parties concerned in the importation is never investigated; and the real character of the person making the entry, as owner or agent, is in most cases concealed or disguised under the mask of a general consignment, as has been already stated. It is, however, supposed that more than one-half of the goods subject to ad valorem duties, which are now imported into the United States, are entered by persons who, with some difference of forms and names, are in truth the mere representatives of the owners of the goods.

It is impossible to ascertain with exactness the extent to which the revenue suffers by false invoices and appraisements of goods subject to ad valorem duties. The records of the Treasury and of the custom-houses would show the difference between the invoices and the appraisements required by the collectors, where there are invoices, and appraisements have been required; but they would show nothing more. This difference would indicate a very inconsiderable part of the loss of the revenue. The difference between the real value, or bona fide foreign cost, and the sum upon which the duties are actually charged and received, is the great and important difference from which the loss to the revenue results. Of this difference nothing appears at the Treasury or at the custom-houses. If it extended to the subduction of one-half, or any other proportion of the ad valorem duties, still everything would be fair upon paper. The records of the Treasury would show the entries and appraisements upon which the duties had been paid; but they would show nothing else to establish the real and bona fide value or cost upon which the duties should have been paid.

As the records of the Treasury can furnish no material elucidation of the facts and views which have been stated, I have not proposed any formal call upon that department. I have, however, obtained from the Register of the Treasury a statement exhibiting the respective amounts of the ad valorem duties and the specific duties distinctly from each other, from the year 1794 to the year 1815, including both those years, which I submit to the Senate. The object of this statement is to show what proportion of the aggregate amount of our imports is subject to duties of the one class, and what proportion to duties of the other class; or, in other words, what part of the revenue is derived from ad valorem duties, and what part from specific duties. From this statement it appears—

1. That though the proportion between the amount of the ad valorem duties and the amount of the specific duties has varied considerably in the different years, both in the gross sums of each, and also in the net balances of each remaining after the deduction of drawbacks; yet that in each of the years, between 1793 and 1815, the gross amount of specific duties uniformly exceeded the gross amount of ad valorem duties, and that the excess was uniformly considerable.

2. That a much greater proportion of the merchandise subject to specific duties has been exported than of that subject to ad valorem duties.

3. That in every year between 1793 and 1815, excepting the years 1796, 1809, and 1810, the net amount of specific duties remaining after the reduction of drawbacks paid on exportation exceeded the net amount of ad valorem duties remaining after the deduction of drawbacks paid on exportation.

4. That in 1815 the proportion between the respective amounts of the two classes of duties which had generally prevailed before, was not only suddenly but greatly reversed; the gross ad valorem duties in that year being $23,382,849, and the gross specific duties being $14,784,274.

In order to attain minute accuracy in a comparative statement of the product of the ad valorem duties, and the product of the specific duties, in the several years of the period comprised in this statement, it would be requisite to bring into the calculation the different rates of duties which have existed at different times, and also the several changes which have been made in the ad valorem class, and in the specific class, by transferring particular articles from one class to the other. If the investigation were pursued still farther, it would be necessary to take into view the relations of the United States with other countries, in the several years of this period. War and peace; neutrality and belligerent aggressions; our own laws prohibiting or restricting certain branches of commerce; the progress of our own manufactures, and other events have all had their influence upon the proportions between the amount of ad valorem duties and the amount of specific duties, which appear in the several years of this period. But minute accuracy, in these respects, is not necessary to the present purpose.

The net amount of the two kinds of duties respectively, in 1815, and the discrimination between the amount of ad valorem duties and the amount of specific duties, either gross or net, in the years 1816 and 1817, cannot at present be obtained from the Treasury. In the absence of official materials, it may be assumed, as the best conjecture which can be offered, and as a probable approximation to fact, that the proportion between the net amount of ad valorem duties and the net amount of specific duties, in each of the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, is the proportion which exists between the gross amount of ad valorem duties and the gross amount of specific duties, in the year 1815; or, in other words, that the net ad valorem duties for the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, are to the net specific duties for the same three years, as 23,382,849 are to 14,784,274. This being assumed, and taking the total net amount of duties on merchandise, for the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, to be eighty-four millions, which is somewhat less than it is made by the statements and estimates of the Treasury, it will follow, that of the sum of eighty-four millions, about fifty-two millions have arisen from the ad valorem duties, and about thirty-eight millions have arisen from the specific duties. This result, which is not meant to be strictly accurate, may suffice to show, in a general view, how great a part of our imports now consists of articles subject to duty on the value, and how large a part of our revenue is now derived from the ad valorem duties. It is also to be remembered that the amount of the ad valorem duties would be far greater, if they were collected as well as the specific duties.

But, without including any part of that portion of the ad valorem duties which is lost by frauds, it may justly be assumed, that the net amount of ad valorem duties is now higher, in proportion to the net amount of specific duties, than the gross amount of ad valorem duties is to the gross amount of specific duties, according to former experience, in this respect. Making some little allowance, on this account, in favor of the net ad valorem duties, and proceeding upon the facts and principles already stated, we are led to the conclusion that, of the total net revenue now received from merchandise, about two-thirds arise from the ad valorem duties, and about one-third arises from the specific duties.

Though it is not possible to ascertain, with exactness, the extent of the loss to the revenue in the ad valorem duties, arising from appraisements and false invoices, yet some probable estimate of the amount may be made. I have endeavored to form such an estimate. The amount of the loss I have heard estimated by very intelligent men, at one sixth, and at one-fifteenth part of the total amount of ad valorem duties which should have been received; and at all rates, between a sixth and a fifteenth part. Taking all the information which I have been able to obtain, and the estimates and opinions of well informed men, in whose knowledge and judgment I have great confidence, as the basis of my own opinion, I cannot estimate the loss to the revenue, arising from these causes, at less than ten per centum. By this I mean that, taking all the valuations upon which all the ad valorem duties are computed, as well those which are fair and just, as those which are fraudulent, and below the true value in various degrees, including also all the appraisements, and speaking of the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, the aggregate amount of all the entries and appraisements, has been less than it should have been, by at least a tenth part of the true cost or value. Thus, if the total amount of merchandise subject to ad valorem duties imported in a given period, is of the true value or cost of ten millions, the numerous undervaluations which take place in particular instances, reduce the total amount of the whole to nine millions; and thus a tenth part of the duties which should be paid is lost. I certainly do not profess to be accurate in a case where accuracy is unattainable. I can only say, that I have sought information from every source accessible to me; I have stated the facts as they appear to be from all the information which I have been able to collect: and I am obliged to conclude, that at least a tenth part of the ad valorem duties is lost by these frauds.

Estimating, then, that the loss in the ad valorem duties, arising from false statements of the foreign cost and appraisement, amounts to ten per centum, and taking the ad valorem duties for the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, at fifty-two millions, it follows that the loss to the revenue from these causes, during these three years, has exceeded five millions of dollars. The result will of course vary, according to the principles assumed.

This loss of revenue, whatever may have been its amount, has gone principally to enrich foreigners, at the expense of our own merchants, our own manufacturers, and our own Treasury.

My object, upon this occasion, has been, to bring into one view the provisions of the present system of collecting the ad valorem duties, as those provisions are established by law, and at the same time to exhibit a view of the manner in which the ad valorem duties are levied in fact; or, in other words, to present to view the theory and the practice of the system, by the side of each other. I have thus endeavored to point out the mischiefs which now occur in the collection of this branch of the revenue, to define their nature, and to state their extent.

Such being the practical operation of the present system of collecting the ad valorem duties, what is the cause of the evil? Is the evil to be ascribed to the officers charged with the execution of the system? I apprehend that it is not to be ascribed to them. I do not suppose it to be the fault of the officers of the customs, that the system operates in this manner. The present system is, I believe, executed as fully and fairly as can ever be expected, from the nature of its provisions. In my opinion, the fault is not in the administration of the system, but it is in the system itself. The basis of this system is the price or cost of the merchandise in the foreign country. That principle having been assumed, it was perhaps inevitably necessary to require invoices and oaths from persons interested, the owner, importer, or agent, in order to establish the foreign price or cost. These proofs are, in their nature liable to great abuse and perversion. It is because these proofs are essential to the present system, and because they are exceedingly liable to abuse, and are abused in fact, that the system itself is supposed to be unsound in this respect, or at least that it is no longer adapted to the present course of trade, and the present rates of duties. The checks and penalties upon false statements of the foreign cost, provided in the present system, are found to be feeble and inadequate in their operation; because, in attempting to enforce those checks and penalties, the same difficulties and the same abuses again occur; for here, as in the first instance, the question still is, what was the foreign cost of the merchandise? a question to be determined by proofs drawn from a foreign country, or by modes of proceedings which the profligate do not fail to pervert to their own illicit purposes.

So far as is known, the principle of making the foreign cost the basis of ad valorem duties, has never been adopted by any other Government, or in any other country; and is peculiar to our system of collection.

It is true that the present mode of determining the value of goods subject to duty ad valorem, has prevailed from the commencement of the present Government to this time. When the present system of collection was first established, the ad valorem duties were low, and the temptation to fraud was comparatively small. Many successive alterations were made in the rates of duty, by which, in most cases, the duties were advanced; but still, our duties, before the late war with Great Britain, were moderate, compared either with those which have since been imposed, or with the duties of other countries. It is probable, that for many years after the commencement of the duties and the system of collection, in 1789, the fraud of false invoices was not often practised; but it is believed that this species of fraud had, before the late war, gradually gained much ground, as the duties were gradually increased, and the methods of accomplishing the object, with impunity, became better understood.

By the act of the first of July, 1812, the duties then existing were doubled, and double duties were to continue for one year after the termination of the war. These duties were continued, by a subsequent act, until the 30th of June, 1816, when they ceased, and the present duties took their place.

During all these periods, and notwithstanding the augmentations in the rates, the system for the collection of the duties has remained, in substance, the same.

Consulting experience, the sure test of the past, and the safe monitor for the future, we learn, that, in proportion as the duties are increased, the collection is endangered; and in proportion as the duties are increased the Government must diminish its reliance upon the oaths of parties interested, as securities against fraud. It is therefore perhaps, not surprising, that the present system should have been found tolerably successful, in the collection of the low and earlier rates of duty; and that the same system should now be, in some respects, no longer adequate to the collection of duties so considerable as those which now are, and for sometime have been, in force.

I do not possess the means of judging of the extent to which merchandise is clandestinely introduced upon the Northern and Southern frontiers of the United States, in such manner as entirely to avoid the payment of duties. To whatever extent this species of fraud may be carried, upon those frontiers, it certainly does not occur, in any great degree, elsewhere. Laying out of view the loss to the revenue, from clandestine importation, it is believed that there is no other species of fraud, excepting the one in question, of false statements of cost, or under valuations, by which the revenue suffers, in any material degree. Indeed, all the other frauds, which now occur, or have at any time been practised upon the revenue, are trivial and inconsiderable, compared to this. The loss of so much money to the Treasury may, however, be of far less moment to the nation, than the baneful influence of so corrupt and corrupting an example. It is the first great and serious inroad which has been made upon our revenue by fraud. The path has been explored—it has been trodden with success; and will assuredly be pursued, if it shall remain open. The corrupting influence of this fraud, attended as it is, in part, by perjury, is obvious. The contagion of so pernicious an example cannot be too soon or too effectually arrested.

The justice due to our own merchants requires that these fraudulent practices should be corrected. To them the injury is deep and serious, in the same proportion as it is lucrative to the unprincipled.

I forbear to descant upon the subject of domestic manufactures. It is a great subject, closely connected with all the greatest and best interests of this country. I hope and trust that this Government will give to our own manufactures encouragement and support greater and more effectual than they have yet received. But the question whether farther protection shall be given to domestic manufactures is not now under consideration. The present question, so far as it concerns our manufactures, is, whether they shall really enjoy the protection which has been promised to them by the existing laws. It is, merely, whether the existing duties on imports shall be enforced and effectually collected? Surely the least that can be done for our own manufactures is to levy, in fact, the duties which the existing laws impose. Surely, if there were no other motive, the faith of the Government, as well as the just encouragement due to our own arts and industry, would require that our own manufacturers should not suffer by a fraudulent competition, or lose the protection which the Government meant to give, and which he expected to receive, in the existing rates of duties. A very large part of the foreign articles, now subject to ad valorem duty, come directly in competition with our own manufactures of the like articles; as, for example, all the manufactures of wool and cotton. Hence it is that the frauds which now take place in the collection of the ad valorem duties are as injurious to our own manufactures, as they are to the merchant and to the revenue.

I have thus attempted to place these mischiefs before the Senate. It belongs to the Legislature to provide a fit remedy. It is not my intention to attempt, at this time, a discussion of the various schemes and projects which might be suggested, as amendments to the system of collecting the ad valorem duties, or as substitutes for it. This subject is, in itself, one of much difficulty. The difficulty is perhaps greater in this country than in any other. The nature of our institutions and the genius of the people, forbid the exercise of those arbitrary powers which are invested in the revenue officers of most other countries; and they require, that the powers of our officers should be defined by law, as far as possible. The restrictions which are thus requisite for the security of private rights, become immediately the loop-holes of the law, through which the unprincipled escape with their illicit gains. The security of the revenue, on the one hand, and the freedom of commerce, to the honest merchant, on the other, are the two great objects which are to be reconciled and adjusted to each other, in any system of collection which may be established. These objects may, by wise provisions, be, in a very great degree, reconciled to each other; and we know, that where any abridgement of an unlimited freedom of commerce is necessary to the security of the revenue, the intelligent merchant is the first to approve and applaud judicious regulations, as useful to him as to the revenue, since it is only by such regulation that he and the public can be secured against the stratagems and frauds of the rogue.

But without attempting to discuss, or even to state, the various projects of reformation, which might be suggested, I shall briefly submit a few ideas upon this subject.

If the evasions and abuses which now occur result, as is believed, from the present system of collection, the remedy must be found, in some alteration of the system itself.

A considerable part, perhaps one-fourth or one-fifth in amount of the articles now imported, and now subject to ad valorem duties, may, with entire convenience, be subjected to specific duties. [Mr. SANFORD here went into a statement of the articles to which he alluded, specifying those which he conceived might be very conveniently charged with duty upon the number, weight or measure, instead of the value.]

The advantages of specific duties over those imposed on the value, in point of security to the revenue, and in their fair and equal operation, are well known. The plan of specific duties is free from those inequalities and uncertainties which must always, in some degree, attend valuations. Such is the excellence of this mode of charging duties, that though our present specific duties, like those ad valorem, are high, compared with the earlier rates, and though the specific duties are in general much higher than those ad valorem in reference to the intrinsic values of the different subjects on which they are respectively imposed, yet it is believed that the specific duties are collected with greater punctuality and certainty, and without any considerable loss to the revenue. This fact likewise shows that the present system of collecting the specific duties is excellent, since it is found to be so by experience; and it also affords a very satisfactory proof that the losses now sustained by the revenue in the ad valorem duties do not result from any want of vigilance or fidelity on the part of the officers of the customs who collect both the ad valorem and the specific duties.

I am aware that the bulk and weight of many of the articles subject to specific duty afford a very important security to the revenue. But if these articles were subject to ad valorem instead of specific rates, it cannot be doubted, that the same evasions and frauds would take place in respect to them which now occur in all the articles now placed in an ad valorem class.

Still the articles, which will probably remain charged with duty on the value, will be very numerous, and of great amount in the aggregate of our imports: and a proper system for the collection of duties imposed on the value will always be necessary.

If it be true, as is believed, that the great source of the present mischiefs is the principle of the foreign cost, and if, as is also supposed, these mischiefs are inseparable from that principle, the principle itself should be abolished. The ad valorem duties, it is conceived, should be imposed and assessed upon the real value, which the merchandise may bear in this country at the time of its importation. The principle of the foreign cost being laid aside, all oaths, invoices, and proofs now required to show the foreign cost, and now so much employed as instruments of fraud, would of course be also abolished. The foreign cost or value being rejected, all the regulations founded on that basis would cease. The additions of ten and twenty per centum, now made to the foreign cost, would cease; and the rates of duty expressed in the tariff, would be simply and truly the whole amount of the duty exacted. The calculations which are now requisite, in order to convert the foreign denominations of money into our own currency, would be unnecessary; and the revenue could never suffer from any fluctuation in the currency of another country.

SENATE.

Proceedings.

DECEMBER, 1817.

If the value of the merchandise here should be made the basis of the ad valorem duties, it would be necessary to revise the rates of those duties, in order to adapt them to the new basis of calculation, and to make the burden upon the intrinsic value of the several subjects, equal to that which they now bear under the present rates, and the present mode of calculation.

The value in question being the value here, if the importer were simply to enter his merchandise without oath, at any value which he might choose to place upon it: and if the merchandise were subject to forfeiture in case of an undervaluation, and to appraisement in doubtful or suspicious cases, the operation of such a plan would, it is supposed, be incomparably better than the operation of the present system. The question in every stage, and in every proceeding, would then be, what is the value of the merchandise in this country; a question always susceptible of satisfactory proof in the port at which the merchandise may arrive. The provisions of forfeiture and appraisement, when applied to the real value of the goods, after they reach our own shores, would probably operate with an efficacy which is scarcely felt, when the question in controversy is the foreign cost of the goods.

Or, instead of the provisions of forfeiture and appraisement, the British system may be adopted. According to that system, the importer enters his goods at any value which he chooses to affix to them. If the officers of the customs think, upon examination, that the goods are undervalued by the importer, they take the goods on account of the Government, and forthwith pay to the importer, from the money in their hands arising from the customs, the sum at which he has valued them, with an addition of ten per centum to his valuation, and the duties paid on the importation. The goods are then publicly sold on account of the Government. If the goods produce more than the sum paid to the importer by the officers of the customs, a moiety of the excess is given to those officers as a reward for their vigilance and fidelity. Thus, the interest of the importer, and the interest of the officers of the customs, are constantly arrayed against each other. It is the interest of the importer to enter his merchandise at a just value; for he is constantly exposed to the hazard of receiving for it no more than the amount of his own valuation, with the specified additions. Thus, the steady and active principle of personal interest, is constantly in exercise on both sides, and is at once the inducement to the importer to enter his merchandise at its fair value, and the inducement to the public officers to wrest it from the importer when it is undervalued by him. Perhaps no scheme of human policy has yet been devised for the purpose of securing fair valuations as the basis of duties, which tends so necessarily to that object in practice, as this plan which is now established and pursued in Great Britain. This system is found in the statutes of the 27 George III, chapter 13, section 17; and the 54 George III, chapter 121, section 1. It may also be seen in Pope's custom and excise laws, pages 223, 224, and 225.

If, however, it should be deemed inexpedient to make a radical change in our system of collection at this time, the system may receive some amendments, which will perhaps mitigate, though they will probably not cure, the present disorders. The existing plan of appraisements, in particular, may be easily improved, by some alterations adapted to the difficulties and abuses which now occur in appraisements.

These few suggestions concerning a remedy are made merely for consideration. I have no favorite project. The resolution which I submit is purposely expressed in very general terms, in order to present the subject for consideration in its most ample scope. I shall willingly concur in any method or measure which will secure the fair and equal collection of the duties, with proper security at the same time to the private rights of the citizen.

Whatever may be the exact extent of the mischiefs which now exist, they are undoubtedly great, and some remedy is necessary. In every view in which the subject can be considered, it seems equally clear that a proper and effectual remedy must be beneficial, at once to the morals and the revenue, the merchant and the manufacturer of our own country.

When Mr. SANFORD concluded, the resolution was agreed to.

WEDNESDAY, December 17.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Alfred M. Carter, reported a bill for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

the General Land Office to furnish each soldier, who may receive a patent for military bounty land, with a description of the quality of his lot, was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Land Claims.

The resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives in Congress, and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. DICKERSON, KING, DAGGETT, MACON, and STOKES, were appointed the committee.

The bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants, and perfect titles, on certain entries and locations of lands therein described, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for designating the western boundary of the Virginia military tract; and, on motion by Mr. ERPE, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act establishing the Mint, and the act concerning the Mint;" together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Finance; and, the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and, the amendments having been concurred in, the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

MONDAY, December 29.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from Andrew Allen, of New York, presenting to the Senate a copy of the first Message of President Monroe, printed on gilt leather, after a new and improved method, for which he has recently obtained a patent; and the letter was read.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of John Brown, sen., of the county of Belmont, in the State of Ohio, praying to be released from the payment of duties on certain stills, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MORRIL presented the petition of John Davis, of the town of Warner, in the State of New Hampshire, representing that he served as a soldier in the Revolutionary war, and praying compensation for his services; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. NORRIS presented the memorial of Samuel Jelley, and others, inhabitants of the town "Rising Sun," praying a post route through the same, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Henry

Jones, who served as a soldier in the late war, praying a pension, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. CAMPBELL presented the memorial of the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, on the subject of unsatisfied claims for land in that State, derived under the authority of the State of North Carolina; and the memorial was read, and ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. TAIT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of augmenting the pay of the militia, when called into the service of the United States.

The bill for the relief of Silas Willard was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract; and, no amendment having been made thereto, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants, and perfect titles, on certain entries and locations of lands therein described; and, on motion by Mr. MORROW, it was referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, STOKES, MACON, WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, and MORROW, were appointed the committee.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 16th of this month, requesting information touching the execution of so much of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent, as relates to the restitution of slaves, which has not heretofore been communicated, I now transmit a report of the Secretary of State on that subject.

JAMES MONROE.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

December 24, 1817.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the Senate of the 16th instant, requesting information touching the execution of so much of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent as relates to the restitution of slaves, which has not heretofore been communicated, has the honor to report to the President, that no answer has been received from the British Government to the proposal made by order of the late President, on the 17th of September, 1816, that the question upon the different construction given by the respective Governments to that article, should be referred to the decision of some friendly sovereign; that the late Minister of the United States in England, before his departure from London, renewed the request for an answer, and that the present Minister at the same Court has been instructed to invite again the attention of the British Government to the subject. All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN Q. ADAMS.

SENATE.

The Message, and report therein mentioned, were read.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act supplementary to the act establishing the Mint, and the act concerning the Mint," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed with amendments.

TUESDAY, December 30.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, showing the amount of duty which accrued on salt imported during the years 1815 and 1816, and from the 1st January to the 30th June, 1817, together with the amount paid for bounty on pickled fish exported, and for allowance to vessels employed in the fisheries during the same period, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 24th instant; and the report was read. Whereupon, Mr. SMITH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That "a statement from the Treasury Department, showing the amount of duty which accrued on salt imported during the years 1815 and 1816, and from the 1st January to the 30th June, 1817, together with the amount paid for bounty on pickled fish exported, and for allowances to vessels employed in the fisheries during the same period," be referred to the Committee on Finance, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law laying that duty.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of Thomas Patten, praying a pension, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of Alexander Macomb, praying to be confirmed in his title to certain islands situate at the mouth of the river Detroit, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 29th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Militia to inquire into the expediency of augmenting the pay of the militia when called into the service of the United States; and agreed thereto.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Noah Miller," reported it without amendment.

The bill to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract, was read a third time, and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to remit the duty on a painting presented to the Pennsylvania Hospital;" a bill entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army;" a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Aikman;" a bill entitled "An act for the relief of Joel Earwood;" and a bill entitled "An act making provision for the establishment of additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri;" in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The five bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

Mr. DAGGETT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a statement of the proceedings which may have been had under the act of Congress, passed the 3d March, 1817, entitled "An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive." Also, that the President be requested to give to the Senate such information as he may possess, in relation to any location of land, or settlement made by any individual or individuals, under the aforesaid act.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee on Claims, reported a bill for the relief of William Edwards and John G. Stubbs, (compensating them for their services in surveying lands in the Territory of Illinois;) which was read, and ordered to a second reading.

SILAS WILLARD.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill for the relief of Silas Willard.

[Some discussion took place on this bill, from which it appeared that the case was this: that the petitioner was the bail of John M. Willard, who was indicted in the circuit court of Vermont for trading with the enemy in Canada during the late war; that the accused, flying the country, and not standing a trial, his bond was forfeited, and his bail became responsible. He prays relief; and his petition is supported by good evidence that the bail required was excessive; that he has since been reduced to poverty, and is a man of the fairest general character.]

It was not denied that the petitioner merited relief, but it being suggested by Mr. SANFORD that the President was already authorized by law, on the recommendation of the Secretary of the Treasury, to extend relief to insolvent debtors to the United States, in certain cases, and that legislation in this case was unnecessary, the bill was, with the consent of Mr. ROBERTS, the chairman of the committee who reported it, postponed to Friday next.

WEDNESDAY, December 31.

Mr. TROUP presented the petition of Joseph Cumming, administrator of James Murren, deceased; and also the petition of Samuel Parker, executor of George Parker, deceased; praying indemnification for claims to land in the Yazoo purchase, surrendered to the State of Georgia, as stated in the petitions; which were read, and severally referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. KING presented a memorial of Richard Varick and others, surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army, representing their services, the engagements under which those services were performed, and the manner in which those engagements have been attempted to be fulfilled, and praying that provision may be made by law for ascertaining and funding the balances which may be due to them; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. ERRES presented the petition of the Mechanic Relief Society of Alexandria, praying an act of incorporation, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Winslow and Henry Lewis," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, it was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. BURRILL submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends at Baltimore, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the United States, on the subject of the African slave trade, as more effectually to prevent said trade from being carried on by citizens of the United States under foreign flags, and also into the expediency of the United States taking measures in concert with other nations for the entire abolition of said trade.

Mr. BURRILL also submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the District of Columbia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of commencing the erection of the centre building of the Capitol, and of making provision for the speedy completion thereof. That the said committee be also instructed to inquire whether suitable apartments can be had in the Capitol for the reception and accommodation of the Library of Congress; and in case such apartments cannot be had there, to inquire into the expediency of purchasing or erecting a convenient building for the Library.

Mr. TAIT gave notice that he should on Friday next ask leave to bring in a bill in addition to an act making appropriation for repairing certain roads therein described.

Mr. SANFORD gave notice that he would, on Friday next, ask leave to offer a joint resolution, directing the publication of the journal and proceedings of the Convention which formed the present Constitution of the United States, now remaining in the office of the Secretary of State.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 30th instant, for referring to the Committee on Finance the report of the Secretary of the Treasury in relation to the duty on salt, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law laying that duty; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 30th instant, requesting information of the proceedings which may have been had under the act, entitled "An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive;" which having been amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement of the proceedings which may have been had under the act of Congress, passed the third of March, 1817, entitled "An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands, for the encouragement of the cultivation of the vine and olive."

Also, that the President be requested, to give to the Senate, such information as he may possess, in relation to any occupation of land, or settlement made by any individual or individuals, under the aforesaid act.

The bill, entitled "An act to remit the duty on a painting presented the Pennsylvania Hospital," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Aikman," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joel Earwood," was read the second time, and referred to the same committee.

The bill, entitled "An act making provision for the establishment of additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri," was read the second time, and referred to the same committee.

The bill, for the relief of William Edwards and John G. Stubbs, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Noah Miller;" and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

On motion of Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the surviving officers and soldiers of our Revolutionary Army, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The Senate adjourned to Friday morning.

FRIDAY, January 2, 1818.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of John Peters and Sabin Pond, of Boston, and the report was read.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred on the 22d ultimo, the petition of William Esenbeck, were discharged from the further consideration thereof; and it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. ASHMUN, the petition of John Peters and Sabin Pond, together with the report thereon of the Secretary of the Treasury, this day communicated, was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. LEAKE submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of amending the several laws relative to the sale of public lands.

Mr. SANFORD asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution, directing the publication of the journal and proceedings of the Convention which formed the present Constitution of the United States, now remaining in the office of the Secretary of State; and the resolution was read the first and second time by unanimous consent; and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, to consider and report thereon; and Mr. SANFORD, Mr. KING, Mr. MACON, Mr. EPPES, and Mr. TAIT were appointed the committee.

Mr. TAIT asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill, in addition to "An act making appropriation for repairing certain roads therein described;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 31st ultimo, for instructing the Committee on the District of Columbia to inquire into the expediency of erecting the centre building of the Capitol, and of providing suitable apartments for the accommodation of the Library of Congress; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Silas Willard, and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of William Edwards and John G. Stubbs, and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Weaver Bennett, made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Haffield White, also made a report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That a bill be reported allowing Haffield White the sum of two hundred and fifty dollars, in full of all his claims on the United States.

The report and resolution were read.

AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 31st ultimo, for instructing the committee to whom was referred the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, at Baltimore, on the subject of the African slave trade; and the resolution being read—

Mr. TROUP rose to object to the last clause of the resolution, which contemplated a concert with foreign nations. He thought this a most extraordinary proposition, and asserted that, according to his apprehension, no measure could be adopted more replete with danger to the welfare, to the very existence of this country, than a formal coalition, for any purposes, with any foreign nation whatever. It was a policy, a resort to which ought always to be resisted, and he hoped would be resisted with a firmness not to be overcome. The object of the first part of the proposition, for making our laws against the slave trade more perfect and more effectual, Mr. T. approved, and was willing to co-operate in it. He was ready to go as far as any one, in enforcing, within our own jurisdiction, the abolition of the African slave trade. Within our land line, or water line, even on the high seas, he was willing to enforce our own laws on the subject; but to direct the President to enter into any compact or concert for this object with any foreign nation or individuals, was a step he would never consent to. He could not separate from foreign alliances the idea of foreign politics and foreign wars; and the proposed measure he should view as the commencement of a system of foreign connexions tending to foreign alliances, to which Mr. T. expressed great repugnance. Unless, therefore, the propositions embraced by the resolution were separated, he should be obliged to vote against it.

Mr. BURRILL was pleased, he said, to find that Mr. TROUP had no objection to the main object the resolution had in view, of putting an entire stop to the African slave trade—on this point, he believed, there was no diversity of opinion throughout the country. Mr. B. regretted, however, that such a view had been taken of the concert with other nations proposed to effect the object; because it was only by such concert and co-operation that the slave trade could be abolished. Mr. B. entirely agreed as to the impolicy of foreign alliances; and if the general objection to them applied to the proposition he had submitted, he admitted it would be a sound and substantial one; but he could not view the proposed concert in this light, nor could he conceive that any such disastrous consequences would follow it as had been anticipated by the gentleman from Georgia; that apprehension, he thought, was altogether groundless. Nor was the principle of the proposed concert, Mr. B. said, a novelty in this country. By referring to the Treaty of Ghent, it would be found that our Ministers had either made or received overtures on this very subject, and a provision was in consequence inserted in the Treaty. The concert had been considered as indispensable to bring about the entire abolition of the slave trade; and, Mr. B. said, it had been found impossible to put an entire stop to it without a co-operation among the nations prohibiting it; for, no matter how many nations prohibit the trade, if one or two are allowed to carry it on, the evil will still exist.

Mr. TROUP replied, that the proposed concert for abolishing a particular traffic on the high seas presupposed resistance, and resistance was to be repressed by the united means of the nations entering into the compact. This, certainly, Mr. T. said, was one step towards, and might be the prelude to, alliances with foreign Powers. Besides, he said, this was not one of those traffics proscribed by the law of nations, though prohibited by our statutes; and he doubted the expediency of such a combination to put down a trade which was thus permitted. If motives of humanity are urged in favor of this measure, let us, said Mr. T., begin at the fountain head. If the policy of this country is to be changed; if the well-remembered parting advice of a wise and good man is to be departed from, and we are to commence a system of "entangling alliances," let us look for some objects worthy of the change; let us aim at the abolition of impressment, and free our seamen from that odious tyranny; or let us enter into the cause of South American emancipation; let us not enter, for the first time, upon a system so fraught with danger, without some such great justifiable motive; without the certainty of accomplishing some object of an importance corresponding with the sacrifice we are to make.

Mr. KING, in the outset of his remarks, adverted to the delicacy of this question; and said that if, in approaching it, he could discover any danger of the present proposition's leading to that kind of connexion which was apprehended by Mr. TROUP, no one would more earnestly deprecate it than himself. But, he said, it was the boast of this nation that it had the reputation of having been the first to begin the abolition of the African slave trade; the Constitutional provision having reference to this subject, certainly looked forward to a time when this country would be ready to use its best endeavors to put down this iniquitous traffic; and, he might add, there was no provision in the Constitution which had been looked to with more general approbation than that one. The example of this country had excited the emulation of other nations, and all of them having any connexion with this trade, except two, had come into the measures for its abolition. Those two had taken time for further consideration, and so long as their decision was suspended, the regulations of other nations would be inefficient; an entire abolition of the traffic in slaves would never be effected until all united to suppress it. It seems to me, said Mr. K., that we are bound by our own principles, and the promise we have held out, to go a little further, if we can, to give effect to what we have undertaken. It was not important, he thought, in doing so, whether the necessary measures commenced with us, or were entered into at the invitation of others. So long, however, he said, as Spain and Portugal permitted this trade, and so long as any of our own people, to their disgrace, continued to pursue it under those flags, it was necessary to the honor and the interest of this country to concur in any proper measures for its suppression. He could not perceive, he said, how such a measure as this motion looked to, could lead to any such entangling connexion as had been apprehended. What was proposed was an honest and moral concert to put an end to a traffic which is an abomination on the earth. He had no idea of its authorizing the slightest interference with the internal affairs of other nations, or of allowing them to interfere in ours; it could, in his opinion, only redound still more to the honor of our country. An arrangement of the nature suggested, he thought, might be entered into without any great inconvenience, and without any encouragement to that kind of connexion of interests which had been very justly deprecated; and it was, he said, if practicable, a measure which was demanded by a regard for the morals of the country, which our religion itself called for. Nor did he think, Mr. K. said, that it was a sound objection, though there was some force in it, that the proposition originated in this branch of the Government, and not with the Executive. Any branch of the Government, he thought, might express an opinion on any national question; the construction of legislative powers was not so strict as to forbid it; in proof of which, he adverted to the practice in England, whence, Mr. K. said, we took many of our political ideas, where the Parliament often expressed its opinion on subjects of public interest.

Mr. BURRILL made some additional remarks, in reply to Mr. TROUP, and said, that if all nations agreed in prohibiting the traffic, it might not be necessary to enter into any compact on the subject—it would in time, by common consent, become a part of the law of nations. What had been done, he said, to put down the practice, had not repressed and scarcely mitigated the evil. The diminution of the number of nations which still permitted the trade had made the objects of it very cheap on the coast of Africa, and the consequence was that great numbers of the wretched beings were crowded into small vessels, and the evil and cruelty were rather increased than diminished. To cure the evil, the prohibition must be absolute and universal; while it was partial, it must be ineffectual.

Mr. CAMPBELL, without being prepared for a discussion of the subject, said he could not at present see the propriety of adopting a resolution from which no good could result; for we, as legislators, said he, cannot enter into any contract with foreign nations. The Executive only, he said, was the proper branch of the Government to form such an arrangement, and if it had been necessary, he presumed the Executive would have done so; but it would be useless, and therefore improper, for the Senate to act on the subject, because they could not act with effect. It had been remarked, however, that the expression of an opinion by the Senate, might be useful, and that this course was a common practice with the British Parliament. It was common, he knew, for Parliament to address humble petitions to the King that he would cause certain measures to be executed; but between that practice and ours there was no analogy. When this Congress acted, Mr. C. said, they acted effectually, and did not and ought not ever to undertake what they have not power to carry into effect. There was, perhaps, but a single instance of a departure from this practice in the Senate, when, on one occasion, they recommended to the Executive to send a Minister to a foreign Government. That measure he always disapproved, and he was, on principle, averse to originating any proposition in the Senate, which their Constitutional powers did not enable them to consummate. Besides this, Mr. C. declared his unwillingness to enter into any compact whatever with any foreign Power to regulate our own conduct, or to carry our laws into effect. Two nations had thought proper still to permit the trade alluded to. What compact, said Mr. C., are we to form with others, to induce these nations to forbid it? Are we to require Spain and Portugal to give up this trade? Are we to unite with France and England to urge them to give it up? And, should they yet refuse, are we to attempt to force them by arms to do so? Are we, he asked, prepared to risk a war for this object? He confessed he could not see to what other result the proposition tended.

Mr. BURRILL again briefly addressed the Senate, and read to it the tenth article of the Treaty of Ghent, to show that the proposition was not a novelty, and that the United States were specifically pledged to Great Britain to use "their best endeavors" to abolish the trade.

Mr. TROUP replied that, in the very provision referred to, the Executive had cautiously and pointedly abstained from compromising the country to any connexion for this object—the article of the treaty stipulating simply that each party would, with good faith, carry into effect its own statutes on the subject of this trade. The article, in short, engaged the parties to do that which, Mr. T. said, would have been done by the United States without any such stipulation.

Mr. KING rose to enter his dissent to the construction given by Mr. TROUP to the article of the Treaty of Ghent which had been quoted. Surely, he said, it would be much more offensive to admit that we would enter into a stipulation with a foreign Government to carry our own statutes into execution within our own territory, where our power is complete, than that we should engage in a concert to suppress a particular trade on the high seas. He would enter into no such stipulation with any Power on earth, even if it had been deemed necessary; but in this case it was not. He thought the true intention of the article was, that the parties would use their joint endeavors to put an end to the traffic. [Mr. K. then proceeded to remark on the circumstances of the case, which he presumed Mr. CAMPBELL had referred to, to which the Senate had volunteered its opinion on a certain subject to the Executive; but it afterwards appeared, on explanation, that Mr. K. and Mr. C. had not referred to the same case. Lest, however, injustice should be done to Mr. K.'s views of that subject, they are omitted.]

Mr. CAMPBELL, in conclusion, observed, respecting the stipulation of the Treaty of Ghent, that he did not think the provision was intended to oblige either party to carry its own statutes into execution. He presumed it was introduced merely because the subject was at that time fresh in Great Britain, and that country felt anxious to have it introduced into the treaty to give to that instrument some popularity. There was nothing additional to be done in pursuance of the provision, and he viewed it simply as an expression of the pre-existing disposition of the parties to put down the trade entirely.

A motion having been made by Mr. CAMPBELL to postpone the resolution for further consideration, it was postponed to Monday without objection.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, January 5.

WILLIAM HUNTER, from the State of Rhode Island and Providence Plantations, arrived the 2d instant, and attended this day.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson; and a bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act for the relief of John Thompson;' in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. WILSON, the bill entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, entitled 'An act for the relief of John Thompson,'" was also read the second time, by unanimous consent, on motion by Mr. WILSON; and referred to the same committee.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary for the Department of War, transmitting a copy of the Army Register of this date, for each member, conformably to a resolution of the Senate of December 15th, 1815; and the letter was read.

The PRESIDENT also communicated a report of the Secretary for the same department, comprehending statements of the expenditure and application of all such sums of money as have been drawn from the Treasury by the Secretary of War, from the 1st of October, 1816, to the 30th September, 1817, inclusive, conformably to "An act further to amend the several acts for the establishment and regulation of the Treasury, War, and Navy Departments," passed the 3d March, 1809; and the report was read.

He also communicated another report of the Secretary for the same department, comprehending an account of moneys transferred during the recess of Congress, from one specific appropriation to another, by authority of the President of

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. TARR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate the proceedings which may have been had under the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States;" specifying the number of ships put on the stocks, and of what class, and the quantity and kind of materials procured for ship-building. And also, the sums of money which may have been paid out of the fund created by said act, and for what objects; and likewise the contracts which may have been entered into, in execution of the act aforesaid, on which moneys may not yet have been advanced.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred the petitions of William Purcel and Martin Rose, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions.

The report and resolution were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, of the 6th instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to make inquiry relative to section No. 29, in the Ohio Company's and John Cleve Symmes's purchase; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Edmund Dana; and in concurrence therewith resolved, that the prayer of the petition is unreasonable, and ought not to be granted.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, on the petition of John Rice; and in concurrence therewith resolved, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

Mr. CAMPBELL submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring by law the nomination of agents to Indian tribes, to be submitted to the Senate for their consent and approbation, in like manner as the nomination of other officers now are.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joel Earwood," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The amendment to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Aikman," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read the third time as amended, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act to remit the duty on a painting presented to the Pennsylvania Hospital," was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to provide for paying to the State of Indiana three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of the United States lands within the same; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to allow the benefit of drawback on merchandise transported by land conveyance from Bristol to Boston, and from Boston to Bristol, in like manner as if the same were transported coastwise; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

MANUFACTURES.

On motion by Mr. SANFORD, the petition of a number of the inhabitants of Oneida county, in the State of New York, in favor of encouraging manufactures, presented the 22d December, was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The memorial is as follows:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

The petition of the inhabitants of the county of Oneida, in the State of New York, as well manufacturers as others, respectfully sheweth, that the above county contains a greater number of manufacturing establishments, of cotton and woollen, than any county in the State, there being invested in said establishments at least $600,000.

That, although the utmost efforts have been made by the proprietors to sustain those establishments, their efforts have proved fruitless, and more than three-fourths of the factories remain necessarily closed, some of the proprietors being wholly ruined, and others struggling under the greatest embarrassments.

In this alarming situation, we beg leave to make a last appeal to the Congress of the United States. While we make this appeal, the present crisis, the extensive embarrassments in most of the great departments of industry, as well as the peculiar difficulty in affording immediate relief to manufactures, are fully seen and appreciated. Yet, your petitioners cannot believe that the Legislature of the Union will remain an indifferent spectator of the wide-spread ruin of their fellow-citizens, and look on and see a great branch of industry, of the utmost importance in every community, prostrated under circumstances fatal to all future attempts at revival, without a further effort for relief. We could not magnify the subject, which we now present to Congress, beyond its just merits, when we state it to be one of the utmost importance to the future interests and welfare of the United States.

Before we proceed further, and at the very threshold, we disclaim all Legislative patronage or favor to any particular class or branch of industry at the expense of the other classes in the community. We ask of Congress the adoption of no measure, for the relief of manufacturers, which is not deemed consistent with sound national policy, and the best interests of the United States at large. But if a compliance with our prayers be the dictate of wisdom, and for the public good; if our application be justified by the examples of all wise and patriotic States; if no Government of modern Europe is so shortsighted, or regardless, of its duties, as not to constantly watch over and yield a steady and protecting support to the manufacturers of the State, we humbly hope this appeal in behalf of American manufactures will not be made in vain.

That clothing for our citizens in peace, and our Army and Navy in war, are indispensable; and that the necessary supply should be independent of foreign nations, are positions that will be controverted by none. The last war afforded most lamentable proof; your soldiers, exposed to the inclemencies of a Northern climate, were at times found fighting in their ranks almost naked. It will not escape observation, that national collision and hostility are most likely to arise with that nation from whom our supplies are principally derived, and that the operations of war must be prosecuted on the ocean; hence, regular supplies being cut off, smuggling, violations of law, with all the concomitant evils experienced in the late war, are the certain consequences. The same disgraceful scenes are to be acted over again, to the deep reproach of the country. If the present manufactories are suffered to fall, the Government will look in vain for means to avert those calamities. Surrounded with many embarrassments, Government, during the war, saw fit to encourage manufacturing establishments; and those who embarked their capital, it is humbly conceived, were warranted in the expectation of such continuing support of Government as should protect their interest against that foreign rivalry and hostility which is now operating to their ruin. They had a right, as they conceive, to expect this from what the Government owed to itself, and to the independence and best interests of the country, as well as from the example of other nations in like circumstances.

In reviewing the discussions on this great question, your petitioners feel themselves justified in saying, that the question has not been at all times fairly met on its true merits. We have been constrained to witness alarm sounded, as though a new principle was to be introduced, and the country now, for the first time, taxed for the mere benefit of manufactories. What can be more untrue and unjust? We need not remind the honorable the Congress of the United States of what is known to all, that, from the first establishment of the Government, special regard has been had, in laying imposts and taxes, to the protection of domestic manufactures, by increasing the duties on imported articles coming in competition. Again, the tariff, in protecting manufactures, has been represented as taxing the farmer and planter for the benefit of the manufacturer; and, hence, attempts have been made to excite popular prejudice against the latter. We need not dwell on this topic, in showing how unjust to individuals and injurious to the country the charge is. As it respects the manufacturing districts of the United States, there is no distinct class of manufacturers, no separation of the manufacturer and farmer; it is the farmer himself who is the manufacturer; he invests his money in manufacturing stock. With the exception of a few factories, in or near the great towns, by far the greater part of manufacturing stock will be found in the hands of the farmer.

Between different districts or States, one manufacturing and the other not, a different question arises, which resolves itself into a mere equality or apportionment of taxes on the different parts of the Union; and here it will be seen, on a view of the whole system of impost and taxes, that no injustice is done, as the manufacturing districts have, and still do, contribute their full proportion to the public Treasury. Of the internal taxes, it will appear that they have paid an amount greatly beyond the numerical standard or rule of apportionment prescribed by the Constitution. The fact is not here mentioned for the purpose of complaint, but to show how fallacious it is to select the duty on a particular article, to settle the question of equality in the general apportionment of taxes. We might again confidently appeal to the tariff of imports, and ask if the duty is not greater on many other articles than on imported cloths, with the exception of certain coarse and almost useless cottons of the East Indies. This is believed to be the case with most of the specific duties, and eminently so in some instances. Were the Government to proceed much farther than is now contemplated, and bestow premiums for the encouragement of particular branches of industry, examples to justify the measure would be found in the wisest and best administered Governments. While the provision in the Constitution, prohibiting any duty on exports, favors the great staple productions of the South, it injures the domestic manufacturer, and is subversive of the great principle adopted by most nations to restrain the export of the raw material necessary in manufactures. But neither of this provision do your petitioners complain.

We hope to find excuse in the importance of the subject, for submitting to the consideration of Congress the following principles of political economy, which have been adopted by the most enlightened Governments, and are deemed not altogether inapplicable to the United States:

That the public good requires of Government to restrain, by duties, the importation of articles which may be produced at home, and to manufacture as much as possible of the raw material of the country.

That the branches of industry particularly necessary or useful to the independence of the community ought to be encouraged by Government.

That the most disadvantageous commerce, is that which exchanges the raw material for manufactured goods.

That any nation who should open its ports to all foreign importations, without a reciprocal privilege, would soon be ruined by the balance of trade.

The policy of Great Britain, in support of which, no wars, however bloody; no expense, however enormous, are too great a sacrifice, ought never to be lost sight of by the United States. That nation assumes to manufacture for all nations, but will receive the manufactures of none. So tenacious, so jealous is she of the first dawns of manufactures elsewhere, that she binds even the hands of her own colonists. The jealousy of Parliament was excited, nearly a century ago, by the petty hat manufactory of Massachusetts; and an act of Parliament actually passed, in the reign of George the Second, prohibiting the erection of furnaces, in British America, for slitting iron.

The great Chatham, the least hostile to British America of British Ministers, in his speech in the House of Lords, on the address to the Throne, in 1770, expressed his utmost alarm at the first efforts at manufactures in America.

Mr. Brougham, a distinguished member of the British Parliament, recently declared, in his place, that it was well worth while, at the close of the late war, to incur a loss on the exportation to the United States, in order to stifle in the cradle our rising manufactures. It is in vain for any man to shut his eyes against the active rivalry and persevering hostility of British manufactures; and when the capital, the deep-rooted establishments, the improved machinery, and the skill of the British manufacturer, protected, as he always is, by the Government, are considered, it ought not to excite surprise that the American manufacturer, without the support of his Government, is found unequal to the contest. But, yielding to manufactures reasonable support in their infancy, the Government will, at no distant period, find them able to defend themselves against foreign competition and hostility, and, at the same time, make ample returns to the nation for its protecting kindness.

It was the opinion of Mr. Hamilton, former Secretary of the Treasury of the United States, as well as of Sir James Stewart, that no new manufactory can be established, in the present state of the world, without encouragement from Government.

It cost the English Parliament a struggle of forty years, commencing in the reign of Edward the Third, to get the better of the established manufactures of Flanders. It is believed that much less encouragement from Government would place the manufactures of the United States on a secure foundation. While the writers of that nation are seen to highly commend the principle of Adam Smith, that industry ought to be left to pursue its own course, without the interference of the Legislature, the Government has, at all times, and under every vicissitude, turned a deaf ear to the lesson, as though it were intended for other nations, and carried legislative regulations into every department and avenue of industry. The British statute book groans under those regulations. The policy of the Government has proved triumphant; immeasurable wealth flowed in upon the nation, giving it a power and control over other nations never before attained, and so long enjoyed by any people so inconsiderable in numbers.

But let no one imagine that a general system of manufactures is now proposed to be introduced into the United States. We would be understood as limiting our views to the manufactories already established; to save those, which have not already fallen, from the ruin which threatens them.

After all that the present manufactories can supply, there will remain to foreign importation an amount, it is believed, equal, if not exceeding the means of the country to pay for. That importation, let it be remembered, will be mostly from a country which shuts her ports against the productions of the United States, and keeps them so, unless the necessities of her manufactories, or hunger and sedition opens them; and then the fatal suspension often proves, as the experience of the ill-fated shippers of breadstuffs, the present year, will attest, a mere decoy to ruin. Lord Sheffield, in the year 1783, declared that, except in time of war, there never was a market for American wheat in Great Britain, exceeding three or four years in the whole.

There was a time when the balance of trade, believed in both countries to be generally against the United States, was, in some degree, satisfied or counter-balanced by a favorable trade with the West Indies; but a recent change of policy in the British councils has cut off that resource, and the parent State prefers exposing her colonies to starving, rather than open her ports to American commerce.

It is obvious how much that Government presumes on its advantages over us, on the predilection of our citizens for British manufactures, and the influence of the liberal purchases in the South of the material for her cotton manufactures.

We hope to be excused in repelling the unwarrantable imputation bestowed on manufactories of woollen and cotton as being injurious to the health and morals of the community. On this point we may content ourselves with referring to the healthful sites of our factories, the spacious work-rooms, (required by the necessary machinery,) and appeal to every man who has visited a factory, for testimony against the imputation. What is the experience on the subject? Scotland manufactures not only what is required for its inhabitants, but about five millions of dollars annually in the article of cotton alone, for exportation, and yet, in both its physical and moral character, that nation sustains a high elevation. We look in vain for evidence that the arms of Scotchmen have been withered by their manufactories, nor do we recollect the field of battle in Europe where the arms of any nation were found stronger in conflict.

To swell the tide of prejudice against manufactures, it is said that unreasonable prices for goods were demanded, at the period of the late war. To reason with such objections would be a mere waste of time. We might ask what merchant, mechanic, or farmer, in any age or country, ever forbore to raise his prices according to the demand in the market? It enters into first principles. Did the importer treble his first cost on his cloths, even on smuggled goods, and does he make the charge of extortion against manufacturers? The war unhinged everything, and changed the whole order of society and course of business.

It might have been expected, that the present fallen condition of manufacturers would have soothed prejudice and disarmed hostility. With all their alleged war profits, there are now none so poor. Is it not seen, that the destruction of the present manufactories must inevitably produce the same evils of extravagant prices in the event of a future war, as were experienced in the last?

As to the imputed effect of the tariff, in enhancing the prices of imported goods, it is believed that goods were never so low as under the operation of the present duties; and, so far as competition between domestic and foreign goods has contributed to this, credit is justly due to our manufacturers.

It is objected, that the entire industry of the country may be most profitably exerted in clearing and cultivating our extended vacant lands. But what does it avail the farmer, when neither in the nation from which he purchases his goods, or elsewhere, can he find a market for his abundant crops? Besides, the diversion of labor from agriculture to manufactures, is scarcely perceptible. Five or six adults, with the aid of children, will manage a cotton manufactory, of two thousand spindles.

From the gloomy condition of the manufacturers, the mind, turning to another quarter, is cheered with the brightest prospects to others. In the more Southern States, it is believed, that the amount received, during the last year, from the export of two or three articles of agricultural produce only, exceeds forty millions of dollars.

An appeal is made to the equity, to the patriotism, of the Southern statesman: his aid and co-operation is invoked for the relief of the suffering manufacturers of the Northern and Middle States.

In conclusion, your petitioners humbly pray, that provision may be made by law, for making the duties on imported woollens and cottons permanent; for prohibiting the importation of cotton goods from beyond the Cape of Good Hope, for consumption or use in the United States, (according to the example of several European Governments;) for restraining auction sales, of goods, and for the more general introduction and use of domestic goods in the Army and Navy of the United States.

OCTOBER 1, 1817.

THURSDAY, January 8.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the delegates of the Territories, and repealing all other laws on that subject;" a bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria;" and a resolution directing the procurement of certain laws; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills and resolution last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

On motion by Mr. SANDFORD, the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the memorial of William Lorman and others, merchants, traders, and manufacturers, of the city of Baltimore, on the 7th instant, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and it was referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. LACOCK presented the memorial of John Inskeep and others, merchants and underwriters of the city of Philadelphia, who have suffered from the depredations of French cruisers; representing that, by the convention of September 30, 1800, the claims of American citizens for indemnity for such captures, were relinquished in consideration of certain great political advantages in favor of the United States, whereby they conceive the United States are bound to discharge those claims which they prevented their citizens from obtaining abroad; and praying compensation therefor; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of William Wilson, and others, merchants and underwriters of the city of Baltimore, on the same subject; and the memorial was read, and referred to the same committee.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of the religious society of Friends in Pennsylvania, New Jersey, Delaware, and the Eastern Shore of Maryland, praying a revision and amendment of the laws of Congress for the purpose of more effectually suppressing the kidnapping and internal traffic in the persons of color, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 18th of December, the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, at Baltimore.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act, in addition to 'An act for the relief of John Thompson,'" reported it without amendment.

On motion by Mr. SMITH, leave was given to withdraw the documents accompanying the bill, providing an additional compensation to the circuit judge of the 6th circuit of the United States, reported at the last session.

On motion by Mr. DAGGETT, the resolution directing the procurement of certain laws, was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the resolution read a third time as amended.

The bill to provide for paying to the State of Indiana three per cent. of the net proceeds, arising from the sales of the United States lands, within the same, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to allow the benefit of drawback on merchandise transported by land conveyance from Bristol to Boston, and from Boston to Bristol, in like manner as if the same were transported coastwise, was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of William Esenbeck; and in concurrence therewith the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petition of John Brown; and in concurrence therewith, resolved, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 7th instant, for requesting information of the proceedings which may have been had under the act, entitled "An act for the gradual increase of the Navy of the United States," and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the petitions of William Purcel and Martin Rose; and in concurrence therewith, resolved, that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, on the petition of John Hebbert, and others; and in concurrence therewith, resolved, that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Winslow and Henry Lewis," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Claims; and, on motion by Mr. ASHMUN, the bill, together with the amendments, were recommitted to the Committee of Claims, with instructions to ascertain and allow the interest on the amount found to be due the said Winslow and Henry Lewis.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of Joseph Forrest, of the City of Washington, praying compensation for the loss of a certain schooner, called the William Yeaton, chartered in the month of May, 1812, to the agent of the United States to take a cargo of provisions from New York to Laguaira, which was seized and condemned, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The Senate then proceeded to the consideration of the following resolution offered yesterday by Mr. CAMPBELL:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring, by law, the nomination of agents to Indian tribes to be submitted to the Senate for their consent and approbation, in like manner as the nominations of other officers now are.

Mr. TAIT suggested whether it would not be proper to embrace within the objects of inquiry the appointment also of the Superintendent of Indian Affairs. It was an office of much responsibility, he said; through which was disbursed large sums of the public money, but it was an office at present filled without the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. CAMPBELL accepted the amendment suggested to the resolution by Mr. TAIT.

Mr. MORROW remarked that he presumed the Superintendent of Indian Trade was meant, as there was no such officer as Superintendent of Indian affairs—the Governors of the Territories were the superintendents of Indian affairs—and suggested as a further inquiry the propriety of providing for the nomination to the Senate also of Indian factors; when,

On motion of Mr. TAIT, to give time for inquiry into the proper objects to be included in the resolution, it was postponed until to-morrow.

FRIDAY, JANUARY 9.

ELIGIUS FROMENTIN, from the State of Louisiana, arrived the 8th instant, and attended this day.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of William Patterson and others, of Baltimore, manufacturers of woollen and cotton goods; and others, interested in the support and protection of domestic industry, and the improvement of the useful arts in the United States; praying that the protecting duties of the tariff, as now in operation, be made permanent, and that further Legislative provisions be made for the collection of the impost, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH also presented the memorial of the Philanthropic Society of Easton, Maryland, praying some further Legislative provision, for the purpose of more effectually suppressing the kidnapping and internal traffic in the persons of color, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 18th December, the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends, at Baltimore.

Mr. SANFORD presented the memorial of Samuel Campbell and others, manufacturers and vendors of American manufactured paper, in the city of New York and its vicinity, praying the protection of Congress, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 7th instant for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs, relative to the nomination of agents to Indian tribes; which, having been amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of requiring, by law, the nomination of Superintendent of Indian Trade, and of agents to Indian tribes, as also of agents for trading-house establishments, to be submitted to the Senate for their consent and approbation, in like manner as the nomination of other officers now are; and, generally, to inquire whether any, and what amendments are necessary to be made in the laws for regulating intercourse, and for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making further provision for repairing the public buildings," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitted the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Winslow and Henry Lewis," together with the amendments reported thereto; reported the same with a further amendment, which was read and considered, as in Committee of the Whole, and disagreed to; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendment having been concurred in, it was ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time, as amended.

The bill, allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the delegates of the Territories, and repealing all other laws on that subject, was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to 'An act for the relief of John Thompson;'" and, on motion of Mr. ROBERTS, it was recommitted to the Committee of Claims.

The amendments to the resolution, directing the procurement of certain laws, having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the resolution was read a third time as amended, and passed, with amendments.

MONDAY, January 12.

Mr. DAGGETT presented the petition of Elijah Rice, of the town of Wolcott, in the State of Connecticut, a soldier of the Revolutionary army, praying relief in consideration of his long and faithful services and severe sufferings, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. VAN DYKE presented the memorial of Jas. Brobson, Marshal of the State of Delaware, praying an increase of compensation, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORRIL presented the petition of John Orr and others, inhabitants of New Hampshire, praying a post route, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Dunstable, in New Hampshire, to Concord, in New Hampshire, on the river road, so called, through the towns of Merrimack, Bedford, Goffstown, Dunbarton, and Bow, to Concord.

Mr. TAYLOR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the sale of the surplus lands which were reserved to satisfy militia and donation claims, in the neighborhood of Vincennes, in the State of Indiana.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was recommitted the bill, entitled "An act in addition to 'An act for the relief of John Thompson,'" reported it with amendments; which were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of William Farris, senior, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel Cuiting, also made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

The amendment to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Winslow and Henry Lewis," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed with an amendment.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House concur in the amendments of the Senate, to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joel Earwood," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. ASHURN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be directed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the attendance of witnesses before courts martial.

The bill, entitled "An act making further provision for repairing the public buildings," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act, in addition to 'An act making appropriation for repairing certain roads therein described;'" and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the delegates of the Territories, and repealing all other laws on that subject;" and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendment having been concurred in, it was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

On motion, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives, to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joel Earwood," and concurred therein.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of the trustees for the Vincennes University, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

The report and resolution were read.

THE AFRICAN SLAVE TRADE.

The following resolution, offered some days ago by Mr. BURRILL, was taken up:

Resolved, That the committee, to whom was referred the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends at Baltimore, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the United States on the subject of the African slave trade, as more effectually to prevent said trade from being carried on by citizens of the United States, under foreign flags; and also into the expediency of the United States taking measures, in concert with other nations, for the entire abolition of said trade."

Mr. BURRILL said, that, at the time he had the honor of moving the resolution, he had not anticipated any objection to it; but, from the debate on the subject on a former day, it appeared that some honorable gentlemen thought it unnecessary to make the inquiry at all, and that any concert with foreign nations, to attain the end proposed, was highly improper and dangerous. The question before the Senate was not upon the adoption of any specified or prescribed line of conduct, for the purpose of putting the finishing hand to the great work of the abolition of the slave trade; it was merely whether it should be referred to a committee to inquire into the expediency of taking measures, in concert with other nations, for this great and benevolent purpose. The committee may inquire, and be of opinion that it is inexpedient to adopt any measures whatever, or at least that it is not proper to take measures in concert with other Governments. If the Senate should refuse an inquiry into the propriety of this course, they might be subjected to the imputation of disregarding the implied obligations of the Treaty of Ghent, by the tenth article of which it is recited, that both the parties are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote the entire abolition of the slave trade, and agree that both shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object. If the Senate should refuse the inquiry, it might give rise to unjust surmises and suspicions as to the sincerity of the Government in passing laws for this purpose, and in entering into the stipulations of the Treaty of Ghent. The United States cannot justly be charged with having acted in bad faith, either in making or performing treaties; and, as the United States have the honor of having led the way in the glorious cause of abolishing the slave trade, there can be no doubt that, in making this stipulation at Ghent, our Envoys acted with sincerity, and he hoped were entitled to the merit of having proposed the article. This article, as well as the rest of that treaty, met universal approbation. Ought we, then, to refuse to refer it to a committee, to inquire whether further measures are not necessary, or at least expedient? If any honorable gentleman had moved to go into a Committee of the Whole on this question, would it have been refused? What danger or inconvenience, then, could arise from referring the subject for investigation? This Committee, if convinced that further measures are necessary, would report those measures to the House; and, should they recommend a concert with foreign nations for this purpose, the subject then, having some length and breadth, and dimensions, could be examined and considered. But this could not so well be done now, because there was no specific proposition before the House. There was no such danger to be apprehended as some gentlemen imagined, from the generality of the terms of the proposition now under debate. This is the common and ordinary course in commencing the consideration of any subject in the Senate, and the Senate should be cautious not to give ground for the disgraceful suspicion that they are not sincere and hearty in this cause of suffering humanity. Every gentleman in this House wishes for the entire abolition of this abominable traffic, and this is the general voice of the country. The gentlemen here representing the slaveholding States, are as decided as any others on this point, and one of those States (Virginia) was entitled, he believed, to the honor of having been the first State to prohibit it. It was better, as the subject had some connexion with others which were of a peculiarly delicate nature, to refer it to a deliberate inquiry in a small committee, than to make it a topic of debate under some general proposition, in which way considerations which did not fairly belong to the subject would insensibly mingle with it.

Some gentlemen, he said, doubted the propriety of the Senate's advising or directing the Executive as to the commencement of a negotiation, or the purposes of it. It was truly singular if the Senate, who were to be called upon for their advice and consent before any negotiation could end in the shape of a ratified treaty, and without whom no ambassador or envoy could even be appointed, could not express their opinion beforehand, as to the propriety or necessity of any proposed arrangement with a foreign Power. They had done it in the case referred to in the debate upon this motion on a former day, by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) and the gentleman from Tennessee, (Mr. CAMPBELL.) The British House of Commons do it, though that House possesses no part of the treaty-making power, and they had done so in effect in 1783, and on other memorable occasions.

If any measures should be adopted, in concert with other nations, there can be no danger, as some gentlemen apprehend, that we shall, by this means, be entangled in foreign alliances, or involved in war. What nation would be likely to go to war for the slave trade? We have already entered into a concert with Great Britain for this purpose, and we might enter into a like concert with other Powers. All the great Powers of the world, except Spain and Portugal, have already combined, so far as to express their wishes and opinions, and in many instances have gone much further, and have acted in concert with effect. Spain and Portugal may both be influenced by our representations, and induced to co-operate from the desire and the interest they have in conciliating the United States. At least we ought to ask for their concurrence. New governments and republics seemed to be forming, or are formed, in the South; their concurrence in putting an end to the trade is indispensable, if it is ever to be abolished. They have the strongest motives for desiring a good understanding with this country, and would not be deaf to our representations. Should all Christian nations, or a great majority of them, agree upon this point, it would soon be considered a traffic against the law of nations, and this international law must prove more effectual than the municipal laws of separate Governments, acting without concert.

Unless, he said, further steps should be taken, all that had been done would be useless, and worse than useless. The trade being forbidden by some nations, and interrupted by force by Great Britain, the risks of it had increased; many men, who might otherwise have had no scruples of conscience, would not, however, violate the laws of their country, and the consequence was, that the price of the unhappy beings who were the objects of this traffic had fallen very low on the coast of Africa; unprincipled adventurers, restrained by no moral obligation, had engrossed the trade. They crowded the wretches they had purchased for a trifle into the holds of small fast sailing vessels, and the sufferings and mortality of the passage had increased to a frightful degree. It had been lately stated to his Government, by a British officer of rank, Sir James Yoe, that six hundred human beings had been stored aboard a vessel of only one hundred and twenty tons, thirty of whom died in sailing eighty leagues; and enormities of this sort were carried on in sight almost of our shores, and by some, he feared, who had the privileges and the boast of American citizenship.

He would only add, that one cause of our complaint against the late establishment of a pretended republic in Florida, was, that the Government had connived at, and gave facilities to, the carrying on of this trade. The slaves which, under pretext of capture or otherwise, were brought into these places, were smuggled into the United States, in violation of the laws of the United States, and of all the particular States. There was proof, among the documents communicated by the President, that a privateer commanded and manned by Americans under the patriotic flag, as they called it, had taken a slave vessel, also commanded and manned by Americans, and that these slaves had been smuggled into Louisiana in defiance of all law.

With these views of the subject, he hoped the Senate would see the necessity of taking further measures to repress the trade, and at length to put an end to it.

Mr. BARBOUR said, that, while he was decidedly in favor of the main object of the resolution, that of revising the laws, and remedying every defect for the prevention of the wicked trade in question, there was a part of the resolution of which he did not approve, and, if retained, he should vote against it. And hence, lest his views might be misunderstood, he felt himself compelled to intrude on the attention of the Senate, while he briefly disclosed his reasons. Before he did this, however, he would make a few general remarks. He felt himself obliged to the gentleman from Rhode Island, for doing justice to Virginia, in admitting she had been the first to protest against this trade. But it was no more than an act of justice; for such certainly was the fact. Her zeal in this good cause has undergone no diminution. The United States followed her example; America stands in the relation to the rest of the world, that Virginia does to America. She took the lead in the humane effort to exterminate this horrible traffic. He rejoiced to see that the great nations of Europe had adopted her precepts, and were imitating her enlightened and philanthropic example. Spain and Portugal constitute the only exception; the former, it is said, with what truth he knew not, has received a pecuniary compensation to abandon the traffic. Should this be true, as he cordially hoped it might be, Portugal will then stand alone. It is reasonably to be anticipated, that she will not be able to resist the incumbent load of the civilized world; when their remonstrances are enforced by the united influence of justice, humanity, and philanthropy. Africa, then freed from those disastrous effects which this trade has produced, may, under the benign influence of peace, reason and religion, indulge a hope, that in the fulness of time she may participate in the blessings of civilization, with all its beneficent effects. Nor was he averse to adopting measures in concert with any nation, which he believed would be calculated to hasten the destruction of this trade. For his part, he feared nothing from an alliance with any nation, whose only object was humanity. No man could more highly appreciate, than he did, the soundness of the political maxim, inculcated by the Father of his Country, in his legacy to the American people—that of avoiding entangling alliances with other nations; yet, with all his reverence for this wise precept and his determination to pursue its suggestions, he felt no apprehension from the concert proposed. A concert like the one proposed is in its character novel; its object is humanity; while alliances denounced by the above wise maxim, have for their object dominion and power, to be acquired by the misery of mankind; to extricate a nation from which, is not unfrequently attended with a violation of honor; or, if executed, it is frequently with the sacrifice of peace, and sometimes with ruin. But what can we fear? Before any such concert can be taken, the terms on which we unite must receive our sanction; a guarantee sufficient to quiet the apprehensions of the most cautious. In so far, then, as the principal project of the resolution is concerned, or the means of effecting it, he would go with the mover; but the part to which he objected, was that proposing that Congress should unite with other nations to produce the object; this he considered to be improper. Congress can act only in its legislative capacity; and by, consequence, can enter into no concert with other nations. That has been assigned to another branch of the Government. It is through the Executive alone that intercourse and arrangements with other nations can be effected. Leave it therefore where the Constitution has placed it, without discussing the question how far this body has a right to advise, in its Executive character, the Chief Magistrate, upon the propriety of entering into new arrangements with foreign nations; a question on which there is a difference of opinion. He would content himself by remarking, that he believed such an authority had never yet been exercised; but, be the power as it may, it will be readily conceded that this is not one of the cases which would justify it; or, if it were, this is neither the time nor the manner in which it should be performed. It has been urged, indeed, that, by the Treaty of Ghent, America and Britain, having agreed to use their best endeavors to put an end to this traffic, that this course, as now recommended, may find a shelter from criticism in that article; as it is merely in fulfilment of the obligation thereby contracted. Mr. B. conceived that the article in question had no other object, than to furnish to the civilized world an unequivocal testimonial of the sentiments of the contracting Powers in regard to this trade. Both nations having, therefore, made use of what they esteemed the best method to suppress it, and entertaining, reciprocally, the most entire confidence that they were sincere in their wishes to effect it, either would repel with scorn an insinuation that an article of this kind was necessary to secure, in future, their zealous perseverance in a course which had been previously adopted, of their own mere will, and which rested upon a much surer foundation than compact, namely, upon their sense of its justice, humanity, and propriety. But, waiving any advantage to be derived from this view of the subject, and yielding, for argument sake, that the Treaty of Ghent created an obligation on the United States, he would ask if Britain had suggested that this Government had been wanting in its duty? She cannot? Or will any gentleman here insinuate that there is less zeal in the Executive to promote the desired object, than in this House, or the nation? If not, why adopt this anomalous proceeding, and by a legislative act declare the necessity of a concert, and the terms on which it shall be adopted? For if this is not done, why inquire into it? To him, it seemed important that this body should keep within its legitimate sphere, and, when it acts, act effectually. Under these impressions, he permitted himself to hope that the mover himself would consent to such a modification of his resolution, as to exclude the objectionable feature; and, thereby conciliating the whole Senate, to obtain a unanimous vote in its favor; otherwise the division which would ensue, while it might be the means of producing a false estimate of our real opinions, would counteract in no small degree the great object, as well of the mover, as of every member of the Senate; namely, a unanimous opinion of the whole body that the traffic is an outrage upon justice and humanity.

Mr. B. concluded by remarking, that if his proposition was not acceded to, he should move to strike out so much of the resolution as proposed that Congress should adopt measures of concert with other nations.

Mr. TROUT said he had no intention, when he objected the other day to a part of the resolution, to involve the Senate in a debate upon it; and he very plainly perceived that, at this stage of it, it would be considered premature to discuss at large the merits of the question. But he would submit to the Senate if it were competent to them, in union with the President, to pledge the arms and resources of the country, in a concert with foreign Powers, for any object whatsoever. He denied that it could be done in the spirit of the Constitution. It would be a pledge of that which we had not. The arms and resources of the country were confided elsewhere; they were deposited, not with the two, but the three branches of the Legislature; and, in fact, were not even to be found there. The people were essentially the depository of them, and their Representatives the organ. Yet it was proposed to pledge, by an act of the Executive power only, the arms and resources of a nation in concert with foreign Powers, for the abolition of the slave trade. Gentlemen seemed to entertain very different significations of the term concert; for his part, Mr. T. said, he knew of but one signification, which, in its application to the present subject, could legitimately attach to it; a signification sustained equally by the law of nations, the law of diplomacy, as far as he knew such a law, and the universally received acceptance of the term—concert with foreign nations—Sir, what is it but a term for common councils and common efforts? The gentlemen propose to themselves a great object—no less than the universal abolition of the slave trade; other nations, they acknowledge, hold out against them. Will they be content, then, with a concert of common councils? Assuredly they will not. Between nations common councils mean nothing, unless sustained by common efforts; and common efforts between nations mean nothing less than war, if war be necessary for the object. War must be necessary, so long as other nations assert the right and hold to the practice of the slave trade. It is true that you may begin with negotiation, but it is certain that, if negotiation fail, you must resort to war. What would avail a treaty stipulation which would pledge the United States to exert, in concert with Great Britain, their advice and persuasion to induce Spain and Portugal to abolish the slave trade? Spain and Portugal would care nothing about your advice and persuasion, especially when you told them that you intended nothing more. Rhetoric and eloquence are not the instruments of nations for the execution of grand projects. He was well persuaded that the gentleman from Rhode Island meant to deal in something more substantial; idle and insignificant verbiage could not suit his purpose, for, if it did, he already found it in a treaty. This word concert, therefore, Mr. President, means something—it means connexion, combination, alliance, for a given object; it means entangling alliance. You are admonished against entangling alliances; for what reason? Because our Government is of its own kind, insulated, the only Republic in the world, between which and other Governments there is no common principle, no common feeling, no common sympathy; they may combine for their own interests; they may enter into concert for your destruction; they will not be so ready to combine with you either to promote your interests, or interests common to you and them. You propose a concert with crowned heads! They never concert with themselves, but broils, and quarrels, and wars, follow in the train. History is full of them; and, if entangling connexions, sir, between monarchs, who wield the sword and the purse, who make peace and war at their will, be fruitful of these mischiefs, what may we not expect when you enter the lists without the means of doing what you engage to do? Gentlemen will say this mode of reasoning is entitled to little weight; it is speculative—admit it; the argument of experience is alone admissible, and the argument of experience is decisive. The only instance which I recollect, sir, of a concert between this country and any foreign Power is that of the French Treaties of 1778. It was a concert, and it turned out a most entangling one. It was a concert, too, for an object near and dear to the American heart; a concert for liberty and independence. A more important object can never present itself. In the one treaty we stipulated the guaranty of the French American possessions; in the other, we stipulated that France (being in a state of belligerency with any other Power) might use our ports freely with her ships of war and prizes. Now, sir, I pray you, how did we fulfil our stipulations? We did not fulfil them at all. We got out of the difficulty, I will not say dishonorably, but as well as we could. I believe, sir, the men who presided over our councils, at the time of which I speak, were honorable men, and were willing to do whatever they could to carry into effect, in good faith, what they engaged to do; but, sir, they could not; they wanted the sword and the purse, and the Constitution had intrusted them to others; they were intrusted to the people. I sincerely believe, sir, that France saw the embarrassing dilemma, and took pity upon us. She saw we could not execute the guaranty without going into the war, and she forbore to press it. But, in consequence of her thus forbearing, she thought she might the more rightfully demand the rigid execution of the other article. We had stipulated to allow French ships of war and prizes to go and come freely, and to remain at pleasure; it was a stipulation partial in effect. France, being at war with England, it admitted to France what it refused to England. It was inconsistent, too, with the spirit of President WASHINGTON's proclamation of neutrality. France having abandoned her claim for the fulfilment of the guaranty, thought she was entitled to a favorable construction of the article relating to ships of war and prizes. She demanded the right of arming, and fitting, and commissioning in our ports. We resisted, and eventually we found ourselves in a war with France. This, sir, is the only instance of a concert between this country and a foreign Power which I recollect; such has been the result of it, and such will ever be the result. It is unavoidable from the nature of our political institutions. We enter into embarrassing stipulations; we are called upon to execute them; we call upon the people to draw the sword and advance the purse; they answer us, no! we have nothing to do with your treaties of concert or your guaranties; if you are unwise enough to enter into them, you may get out of them as well as you can; you shall not do so at our expense, or with our aid and assistance. And so, sir, they will answer always. They will go to war for rights which belong to them; for their honor, their independence; for interests essentially their own; they will not for rights and interests which are extraneous, and in which they feel no concern. This was the lesson taught by the people to the men who directed our councils on the occasion to which I referred; an awful warning never to put to hazard the peace of this country by connexions with foreign Powers for any objects whatsoever, much less for objects foreign to our interests and our feelings. The treaties adverted to were negotiated under the former Government. It is believed that nothing similar has occurred under the present. Mr. T. said he would no longer tire the patience of the Senate with such desultory remarks; but he could not forbear the expression of his surprise that the proposition of the gentleman should be urged with so much zeal and earnestness, when it was well known to the Senate and the world, that from the origin of the present Government, almost up to the present moment, American citizens, the flesh and blood of the land, had been seized by the Algerines, handcuffed and chained, incarcerated and enslaved, four thousand miles from their homes and the bosoms of their families, and no instance is recorded of a proposition having been submitted to the Senate to advise the President to enter into concert with foreign nations for the abolition of Algerine slavery.

Mr. WILSON called for a division of the question on the resolution, so as to take it separately on its two clauses.

Mr. BARBOUR, observing that the motion he was about to make would supersede that of the gentleman from New Jersey, moved to strike out the latter clause of the resolution.

Mr. MORRILL said, that with peculiar emotions, he asked the attention of the Senate to a few remarks on this subject. It was with extreme diffidence he rose to address the Senate on this occasion. I am not insensible, said he, of the extent of the field on which I enter, nor of my inability to explore it. A subject, sir, co-extensive with the world, in which this extensive Republic have an interest, and on which, by their delegated Representatives, they may express an opinion—whether they will “use their best endeavors” to effect a complete abolition of the slave trade. Sir, upon this it seems there can be but one opinion.

Coming from New England, where slavery is unknown, my prejudices may be strong, my views enthusiastic; but, sir, allow me to be honest, believe me sincere, permit me to be plain. In New England we believe “all men are born equally free and independent”—thus commences our “Bill of Rights.” Whatever their color, powers of mind, property, or rank in society, they are freemen—citizens, not slaves. They have a claim to that freedom in this asylum of liberty. These sentiments, sir, commenced with my existence; advanced with my youth; were strengthened with my manhood; and are confirmed with my age. They are not only mine, but universally the sentiments of those whose confidence and affection have exalted me to this honorable station. Shall I not speak their sentiments on this occasion? Shall I not desire the termination of slavery? It is a duty, sir, I owe to myself, my country, and my God. That respectable section of the nation which I have the honor to represent, has a right to demand it at my hand.

When I examine this resolution, sir, I am unable to discover why any objection should be made. In passing it, we do not say we believe it is expedient to amend "the laws of the United States on the subject of the African slave trade;" nor that we will enter into any "concert with other nations for its entire abolition." But, sir, we say, we are willing to instruct a respectable committee to examine those subjects, in all their parts and bearings, as to the expediency of the objects suggested, and report to the Senate, which report will then be under the perfect control of this body. The Senate may then approve or disapprove, as its wisdom may dictate. Where then is the difficulty? For myself, sir, I am in favor of the resolution. Permit me to assign a few reasons. It is founded, in part, on an article of the Treaty of Ghent. The words are as follows: "Whereas, the traffic in slaves is inconsistent with the principles of humanity and justice; and whereas, both His Majesty and the United States are desirous of continuing their efforts to promote its entire abolition, it is hereby agreed, that both the contracting parties shall use their best endeavors to accomplish so desirable an object." In this, sir, there is nothing very specific, as to the manner in which their desires shall be manifested. But the contracting parties view "the traffic in slaves inconsistent with the principles of humanity and justice," and, therefore, agree to use "their best endeavors," to effect its abolition. How this is to be accomplished, is another point. They may have different views, and, consequently, each may pursue a different course. Therefore, sir, I am perfectly willing to submit the subject to the investigation of the committee, that they may report thereon.

The abolition of slavery was contemplated by the framers of our Constitution. Sec. 9—"The migration or importation of such persons as any of the States now existing shall think proper to admit, shall not be prohibited by the Congress prior to the year 1808." Here, sir, we see those venerable sages prospectively viewed the period in which we live, when Congress should manifest a disposition to abolish the slave trade. Wise provision! a duty negatively expressed. A provision, sir, which has given rise to a disposition that pervades the United States, to pursue and accomplish the benevolent object. Nay, sir, it is not confined to the United States; it extends to almost every civilized nation on the globe. A spirit of philanthropy glows in the human breast. Spain and Portugal are the only nations now averse to the object. The views of Spain, in all probability, will soon accord with those of other nations. Then Portugal will be the solitary kingdom whose voice and arm are not raised against this inhuman traffic. Let us proclaim, sir, that these sable mortals have a claim upon our philanthropy and our benevolence.

I am in favor of the resolution, sir, because its object comports with the dictates of reason and humanity. Though black, they are human beings, in human shape. That is not their crime, but their misfortune. We then ought to commiserate, not enslave them. Let exertions be made to raise them from their present state of degradation; assist in the mighty work. Every human affection recoils at their bondage. May every benevolent heart beat high for their freedom, and every human arm be extended for their emancipation. It is a cause, sir, in which the world is engaged. As it was commenced by the United States, let them continue their efforts; let Congress say, with all civilized nations, they will joyfully bear a part to accomplish an object so desirable, so humane.

But, sir, I am in favor of the resolution in a political point of view. Carry the great design into effect, and you place those forlorn objects within the reach of political and moral instruction. The basis on which every good Government most firmly stands, is knowledge and virtue. Diffuse and extend these sacred principles, and you enlarge the basis on which your Government is built; and, in the same proportion you carry the principles of liberty and the rights of man to those who grope in darkness, and aid in the emancipation of those who are bound in the chains of despotism. Virtue and knowledge, sir, are the firm foundation on which this mighty Republic is erected; on which it rises and on which it will continue to rise, so long as those divine principles are nourished, universally diffused and practised. This is what astonishes foreigners when they tread American ground. All classes of society can read and write, can name and give the characters of our rulers, the principles of our Constitution, the genius of our Government, and the nature of our laws. This was the reason, sir, France could not maintain a Republican Government. Knowledge and virtue were not sufficiently diffused through the nation. It was not on account of the extent of her territory, nor the number of her citizens. Monarchy and general ignorance go hand in hand. Despotism and slavery are always companions. This, sir, accounts for the protracted struggle in South America. They have physical strength and the means, but not knowledge and skill, to concentrate their exertions to the best advantage. Did they possess the general information enjoyed in the United States, their independence would be as certain as the rising sun.

Mr. President, I am in favor of the resolution in a moral point of view. We, sir, are a Christian nation. The Bible is our moral guide. Are not its principles sacred, its precepts salutary, and its commands obligatory? Have not the frowns of indignant Heaven, and the threatenings of Jehovah, rested on nations and cities for their ingratitude to their fellow mortals? Babylon—Babylon the great has fallen! What has brought her down? The scene is viewed in prospect. "The merchants of the earth shall weep and mourn over her." In what did her commerce consist? "In gold, and silver, and precious stones, and pearls, and chariots, and slaves, and the souls of men." Ah, Mr. President, this was the climax of their abominations! They had a traffic in slaves and the souls of men. This brought down the judgments of Heaven. That they may be averted from the world, let the inhuman traffic be abolished to the end of the earth.

Mr. KING observed, that the motion was to instruct a committee to inquire whether further measures can be devised, in concert with other Powers, to put an end to the traffic in slaves on the coast of Africa. The debate, said Mr. K., has taken a wider range than from the definite object of the motion could have been anticipated. The advantages or disadvantages of alliances offensive and defensive, and the policy or impolicy of such treaties, as, with the view of acquiring some complicated though important political advantage, pledge the wealth and strength of the United States, are questions of most weighty importance; the discussion of which, however, is not requisite in debating the motion before the Senate. The concert which is alluded to in the motion, is not the union of arms, but of opinion, of example, and of influence, for the purpose of prevailing on Spain and Portugal to accede to the compact already formed among the nations, to put an end to the African slave trade. Equally uncalled for on this occasion, and more to be regretted, is a discussion of the justice and policy of permitting the existence of slavery. This topic is one, said Mr. K., that, from obvious considerations, has at all times been alluded to, even in the Senate, with great reserve; and, at this time, is without application to the motion under consideration, since not only no Senator approves of the traffic, the abolition of which is desired, but the whole Senate condemn it, and the United States were the first among the nations who restrained their people from engaging in it.

By the Treaty of Ghent, the United States stipulated with Great Britain to use their best endeavors to effect the complete abolition of the traffic in slaves on the coast of Africa. If a committee be appointed, they will inquire what has been done in pursuance of this engagement; they will moreover consider what remains to be done, and whether any measures of concert with other Powers, or otherwise, may be calculated to promote the laudable object of this stipulation. The United States have Ministers not only in England, Spain, and the Brazils, but likewise in Russia, France, the Netherlands, and Sweden. These Ministers may be reminded of the very great interest which the United States take in the universal abolition of the African slave trade; they may be instructed, if they are not so already, to avail themselves, on every occasion, to promote this object; and the concurring representations and influence of many may accomplish what their separate endeavors have hitherto failed to effect. A long depending negotiation with Spain still exists. If we could prevail on Spain to add to the treaty settling our just claims, an article whereby she should engage herself to abolish the African slave trade, and to co-operate with us in endeavoring to prevail on Portugal also to abolish the same, such an article would enhance the value of the treaty in the opinion of the American people, and would not fail to obtain the applause of foreign nations. The object of the motion being of such great importance, the Senate should neglect no opportunity of manifesting their solicitude for its accomplishment; and the inquiry which is proposed may fortunately discover that there are means still in our power, which have not yet been employed in this meritorious service.

But it is objected, that this business belongs exclusively to the President; and, admitting its importance, and the expediency of further exertions, that the Senate have nothing to do or say respecting the same. This objection appears to be of most serious import, as it goes to restrain and limit what is deemed to be the Constitutional power of the Senate. There is some embarrassment in the examination of this objection, and it cannot be fully and satisfactorily done, without adverting to the proceedings of the Senate, in its executive capacity; proceedings which take place with closed doors, and the journal whereof is not published. The observations on this head will, therefore, be of a general nature. Without adverting to the several branches of the executive power, for the purpose of distinguishing the cases in which it is exclusively vested in the President, from those in which it is vested in him jointly with the Senate, it will suffice on this occasion to observe that, in respect to foreign affairs, the President has no exclusive binding power, except that of receiving the Ambassadors and other foreign Ministers, which, as it involves the decision of the competence of the power which sends them, may be an act of this character; to the validity of all other definitive proceedings in the management of the foreign affairs, the Constitutional advice and consent of the Senate are indispensable.

In these concerns the Senate are the Constitutional and the only responsible counsellors of the President. And in this capacity the Senate may, and ought to, look into and watch over every branch of the foreign affairs of the nation; they may, therefore, at any time call for full and exact information respecting the foreign affairs, and express their opinion and advice to the President respecting the same, when, and under whatever other circumstances, they may think such advice expedient.

There is a peculiar jealousy manifested in the Constitution concerning the power which shall manage the foreign affairs, and make treaties with foreign nations. Hence the provision which requires the consent of two-thirds of the Senators to confirm any compact with a foreign nation that shall bind the United States; thus putting it in the power of a minority of the Senators, or States, to control the President and a majority of the Senate: a check on the Executive power to be found in no other case.

To make a treaty includes all the proceedings by which it is made; and the advice and consent of the Senate being necessary in the making of treaties, must necessarily be so, touching the measures employed in making the same. The Constitution does not say that treaties shall be concluded, but that they shall be made, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate: none therefore can be made without such advice and consent; and the objections against the agency of the Senate in making treaties, or in advising the President to make the same, cannot be sustained, but by giving to the Constitution an interpretation different from its obvious and most salutary meaning.

To support the objection, this gloss must be given to the Constitution, "that the President shall make treaties, and by and with the advice and consent of the Senate ratify the same." That this is, or could have been intended to be the interpretation of the Constitution, one observation will disprove. If the President alone has power to make a treaty, and the same be made pursuant to the powers and instructions given to his Minister, its ratification follows as a matter of course, and to refuse the same would be a violation of good faith; to call in the Senate to deliberate, to advise, and to consent to an act which it would be binding on them to approve and ratify, will, it is presumed, be deemed too trivial to satisfy the extraordinary provision of the Constitution, that has been cited. On the whole, there appearing to be no sufficient impediment in the way of the proposed inquiry, either as respects its expediency or the authority of the Senate to institute the same, I am in hopes that the motion to refer the subject to a committee will prevail.

Mr. LACOCK said, the resolution before the Senate contained two separate and distinct propositions; the first was the amendment of the laws that prohibited the introduction of slaves into the United States: on this subject there existed no difference of opinion—all agreed an end should be put to this abominable traffic. If the present statutory provisions were not so formed as to effect this object, they certainly required amendment; and no objection could be made to the inquiry, as this was a legitimate subject of legislation. But, said Mr. L., the other branch of the inquiry is of a very different character; it proposes to inquire into the best manner of executing an article of the Treaty of Ghent. The stipulations of this article are, that the contracting parties, the United States and Great Britain, should use their endeavors to put an end to the slave trade. But could this agreement be carried into effect by law? did it furnish a subject of legislation? Laws were made to operate on the people of the United States, and within their jurisdiction, not to effect an arrangement with foreign Governments. This could only be done by treaty; and surely, said Mr. L., the initiatory steps in making treaties should be left with the Executive. But it has been urged by gentlemen in favor of this proposition, that the Senate can act on this subject by virtue of the Constitutional power of this body to interpose their advice and consent in making treaties. This argument cannot avail them; for, if we claim the power, and exercise it, as a part of our executive duties, why is this discussion, on the subject of a treaty, had with open doors? Has this ever been the practice of the Government? The Ministers of those Governments who admit and carry on the slave trade, are accredited by our Government—are on the spot, for aught I know, in the lobby or gallery, while we are discussing the propriety of putting a stop to their traffic in slaves. That this branch of the subject is improper for public discussion, is admitted by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) who has told you he felt embarrassed by this public discussion; that he is restrained by his situation from making observations that he otherwise would feel authorized to make. This concession on his part should convince every one that the proceedings are irregular. While we are thus openly debating the subject, for aught we know, the President is negotiating with other Powers to effectuate the object we have in view. He is bound, by the Constitution, to see the laws faithfully executed. The Treaty of Ghent has become the supreme law of the land, and it is unfair to presume that the President has neglected his duty. In short, said Mr. L., if we are anxious to have this subject pressed on the Executive, let us close our doors, as in other cases, and make a call on him for information; we shall then be put in possession of the facts officially; we shall know what steps, if any, have been taken, in concert with Great Britain, to put an end to the traffic we all abhor.

The question was then taken on the motion to strike out the latter clause of the resolution, and decided, yeas 16, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Campbell, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Lacock, Macon, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Troup, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Fisk, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, King, Leake, Morril, Morrow, Noble, Ruggles, Tichenor, and Van Dyke.

And on the question to agree to the motion as originally submitted, it was determined in the affirmative.

So it was Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the petition of the committee of the yearly meeting of the Society of Friends at Baltimore, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws of the United States on the subject of the African slave trade as more effectually to prevent said trade from being carried on by citizens of the United States under foreign flags, and also into the expediency of the United States taking measures, in concert with other nations, for the entire abolition of said trade.

TUESDAY, January 13.

The PRESIDENT communicated the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, praying that so much of the twelfth fundamental article of the 11th section of the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, as provides for the signing of the bills or notes of the bank, may be so altered and amended as to remedy the great inconvenience and hazard to which the corporation is subjected under the existing provision; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson," reported it without amendment.

Mr. TROUP presented the petition of Joseph Bevan, of the county of Effingham, in the State of Georgia, praying remission of duties on a steam engine imported into the United States, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ASHmun presented the petition of David Ames and others, praying an additional duty on imported paper, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of A. Farquhar, of Richmond, in the State of Ohio, praying indemnification for the loss of bank notes, robbed from the United States' mail, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the memorial of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, on the unsatisfied claims for land in that State, derived under the authority of the State of North Carolina, presented the 29th of December, 1817, was referred to the committee, to whom was referred the bill to authorize the State of Tennessee to issue grants and perfect titles on certain entries and locations of lands therein described, to consider and report thereon.

The amendment to the bill, entitled "An act allowing compensation to the members of the Senate, members of the House of Representatives of the United States, and to the delegates of the Territories; and repealing all other laws on that subject," having been reported, by the committee, correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed with an amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the petition of the Trustees for the Vincennes University; and in concurrence therewith, the petitioners had leave to withdraw their petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of providing for the sale of the surplus lands in the neighborhood of Vincennes, in the State of Indiana; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of providing for the attendance of witnesses before courts martial; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act, in addition to 'An act making appropriation for repairing certain roads therein described;'" and, on motion by Mr. TAIT, it was referred to a select committee, to consider and report thereon; and Mr. TAIT, Mr. CAMPBELL, and Mr. LEAKE, were appointed the committee.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what further provisions by law are necessary to secure to the heirs of soldiers who died, or who were killed in the service of their country, during the late war, the bounty in land to which they are equitably entitled.

WEDNESDAY, January 14.

Mr. DAGGETT presented the petition of Ann Welsh, of New London, Connecticut, representing that her husband, Captain John Welsh, having been killed during the Revolutionary war, in the attempt to take the British garrison at Penobscot, while at the head of his troops, her hopes of support devolved on her brother, George Hurlbert, who was then an officer in the Continental army: but that the latter received a wound in an engagement with the enemy, of which, after languishing in excruciating distress, he died in the year 1783; leaving the petitioner entirely helpless and unprovided for. In consideration of those losses and her present distress, being old and unable to support herself, she prays relief; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. FROMENTIN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States, a sum equal to the salary of the district court of South Carolina, for the term of one year, during which time the said circuit judge was compelled by law to perform the duties of the judge of said district court.

Mr. MORRIL gave notice that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a resolution, providing for the distribution of the sixth volume of the laws of the United States, among the members of the present Congress.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate what measures have been taken in pursuance of so much of the third and fifth sections of the act, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of a surveyor for the lands in the northern part of the Mississippi Territory, and the sale of certain lands therein described," as relates to the reservation of certain sections, for the purpose of laying out and establishing towns thereon.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of Paul Beck, junior, and Thomas Sparks, of the city of Philadelphia, manufacturers of shot, praying an additional duty of one cent per pound on imported shot, may be laid, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Farris, senior, and in concurrence therewith, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Nathaniel Cutting, and in concurrence therewith, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 13th instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs relative to bounty land; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act, for the relief of John Thompson," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Claims; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson;" and, on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until next Monday week.

AMELIA ISLAND.

The following Message was received, yesterday, from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES:
To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

I have the satisfaction to inform Congress, that the establishment at Amelia Island has been suppressed, and without the effusion of blood. The papers which explain this transaction, I now lay before Congress.

By the suppression of this establishment and of that at Galveztown, which will soon follow, if it has not already ceased to exist, there is good cause to believe that the consummation of a project fraught with much injury to the United States has been prevented. When we consider the persons engaged in it, being adventurers from different countries, with very few, if any, of the native inhabitants of the Spanish colonies, the territory on which the establishments were made; one on a portion of that claimed by the United States, westward of the Mississippi, the other on a part of East Florida, a province in negotiation between the United States and Spain—the claim of their leader as announced by his proclamation on taking possession of Amelia Island; comprising the whole of both the Floridas, without excepting that part of West Florida which is incorporated into the State of Louisiana—their conduct while in the possession of the island, making it instrumental to every species of contraband, and in regard to slaves of the most odious and dangerous character, it may fairly be concluded, that if the enterprise had succeeded on the scale on which it was formed, much annoyance and injury would have resulted from it to the United States.

Other circumstances were thought to be no less deserving of attention. The institution of a Government by foreign adventurers in the island, distinct from the colonial government of Buenos Ayres, Venezuela, or Mexico, pretending to sovereignty, and exercising its highest offices, particularly in granting commissions to privateers, were acts which could not fail to draw after them the most serious consequences. It was the duty of the Executive either to extend to this establishment all the advantages of that neutrality which the United States had proclaimed and have observed in favor of the colonies of Spain, who by the strength of their own population and resources, had declared their independence, and were affording strong proof of their ability to maintain it, or of making the discrimination which circumstances required. Had the first course been pursued, we should not only have sanctioned all the unlawful claims and practices of this pretended government in regard to the United States, but have countenanced a system of privateering in the Gulf of Mexico, and elsewhere, the ill effects of which, might, and probably would have been deeply and very extensively felt. The path of duty was plain from the commencement, but it was painful to enter upon it while the obligation could be resisted. The law of 1811, lately published, and which it is therefore proper now to mention, was considered applicable to the case, from the moment that the proclamation of the chief of the enterprise was seen, and its obligation was daily increased by other considerations of high importance already mentioned, which were deemed sufficiently strong in themselves to dictate the course which has been pursued.

Early intimation having been received of the dangerous purposes of these adventurers, timely precautions were taken by the establishment of a force near the St. Mary's to prevent their effect, or it is probable that it would have been more sensibly felt.

To such establishments, made so near to our settlements, in the expectation of deriving aid from them, it is particularly gratifying to find that very little encouragement was given.

The example so conspicuously displayed by our fellow-citizens, that their sympathies cannot be perverted to improper purposes, but that a love of country, the influence of moral principles, and a respect for the laws, are predominant with them, is a sure pledge, that all the very flattering anticipations which have been formed of the success of our institutions will be realized. This example has proved, that if our relations with foreign Powers are to be changed, it must be done by the constituted authorities, who, alone, acting on a high responsibility, are competent to the purpose; and until such change is thus made, that our fellow-citizens will respect the existing relations by a faithful adherence to the laws which secure them.

Believing that this enterprise, though undertaken by persons, some of whom may have held commissions from some of the colonies, was unauthorized by, and unknown to, the colonial governments, full confidence is entertained, that it will be disclaimed by them, and that effectual measures will be taken to prevent the abuse of their authority in all cases to the injury of the United States.

For these injuries, especially those proceeding from Amelia Island, Spain would be responsible, if it was not manifest that, though committed in the latter instance through her territory, she was utterly unable to prevent them. Her territory, however, ought not to be made instrumental, through her inability to defend it, to purposes so injurious to the United States. To a country over which she fails to maintain her authority, and which she permits to be converted to the annoyance of her neighbors, her jurisdiction for the time necessarily ceases to exist. The territory of Spain will nevertheless be respected, so far as it may be done consistently with the essential interests and safety of the United States. In expelling these adventurers from these posts, it was not intended to make any conquest from Spain, or to injure in any degree the cause of the colonies. Care will be taken that no part of the territory contemplated by the law of 1811 shall be occupied by a foreign government of any kind, or that injuries of the nature of those complained of, shall be repeated, but this, it is expected, will be provided for, with every other interest, in a spirit of amity, in the negotiation now depending with the Government of Spain.

JAMES MONROE.

The Message and accompanying documents were read.

THURSDAY, January 15.

On motion by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH,
Resolved, That when the Senate adjourn, it adjourn until Monday next, for the purpose of having the necessary repairs made in their Chamber to render it safe for their accommodation.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Rees Hill, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the petition of William G. Ridgely, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, praying that certain bonds given for an alleged violation of the non-importation law, may be cancelled and restored to him; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SANFORD presented the petition of Michael Hogan, of New York city, representing that early in the month of February, 1813, a valuable house belonging to him in the village of Utica, was taken possession of by a detachment of United States' troops, on their march from Buffalo to Sackett's Harbor, and by them used as a barrack, and praying redress for damages sustained in consequence thereof, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. SANFORD, from the committee to whom was referred the joint resolution directing the publication of the Journal and proceedings of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, reported it with amendments; which were read.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, January 19.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from Julie Plantou, proposing to sell to Congress an allegorical painting, of her own design and from her own pencil, drawn from the Treaty of Ghent, commemorative of the glory which it shed around the American name; and the letter was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing naval depots, in such numbers, and such places, as may in their opinion, be most advantageous to the United States.

Mr. MACON laid before the Senate the instructions of the Legislature of the State of North Carolina to their Senators in Congress, to endeavor to obtain an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives in Congress, and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States; which were read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred, on the 24th December, 1817, the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives in Congress and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States; to consider and report thereon.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making further provision for repairing the public buildings," reported it without amendment.

Mr. BURRILL presented the memorial of the officers and soldiers of the late Rhode Island brigade of the Revolutionary Army, their heirs and representatives, praying relief as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Alan Farquhar, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. NOBLE submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Centerville to Jacksonborough, in the State of Indiana.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the sale of so much of the tract of one hundred thousand acres of land, granted as a donation to actual settlers in the Ohio company's purchase as shall not have been conveyed agreeably to the terms of the grant.

Mr. MORRIL presented the petition of Thomas Wright, who served as a soldier in the Revolutionary War, praying relief, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DICKERSON presented the memorial of Isaac Briggs, praying certain allowances in the settlement of his accounts, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MORRIL asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution, providing for the distribution of the sixth volume of the laws of the United States among the members of the present Congress, and to the delegates of Congress; and the resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 14th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States a certain compensation for having performed the duties of the judge of the district court of South Carolina. This motion was opposed by Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, at some length, and supported earnestly by Mr. FROMENTIN, and also briefly by Mr. DAGGETT. Mr. SMITH, however, afterwards withdrew his opposition to the motion, and it was agreed to.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 14th instant for requesting information relating to the reservation of certain sections of land, for the purpose of laying out and establishing towns thereon; and the same having been amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate what measures have been taken, in pursuance of so much of the act, entitled "An act to authorize the appointment of a surveyor for the lands in the northern part of the Mississippi Territory, and the sale of certain lands therein described," passed the 3d of March, 1817, as relates to the reservation of certain sections, for the purpose of laying out and establishing towns thereon.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Rees Hill; and in concurrence therewith the petitioner had leave to withdraw his papers.

The bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution, directing the publication of the journal and proceedings of the Convention which formed the Constitution of the United States, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and the amendments having been agreed to with an amendment, the PRESIDENT reported the resolution to the House amended accordingly; and the amendments having been concurred in, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army," reported it with amendments; which were read. [The principal and only material amendment proposed by the committee limits the benefit of the act to such as served to the end of the war on Continental establishment.]

The Senate then resumed the consideration of the bill to allow John Thompson interest on a Revolutionary claim heretofore granted and paid to him by our Government.

After considerable discussion, in which Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. ROBERTS supported, and Mr. DAGGETT and Mr. BACON opposed the bill, the question was taken on ordering the bill to a third reading, and decided in the negative.

So the bill was rejected.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Commissioners of the Navy Pension Fund, containing statements in relation to that fund, made in obedience to the "Act for the better government of the Navy of the United States;" and the report was read.

Mr. TAIT, from the select committee to whom the subject was committed, reported the bill making an appropriation for repairing, and keeping in repair, certain roads, with an amendment, (including that part of the road leading from Columbia, in Tennessee, by the Choctaw agency, to Madisonville, in Louisiana, which lies between the southern boundary of Tennessee and the Indian boundary line near Zadock Brasher's, in Mississippi.)

TUESDAY, January 20.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of John Keemle, late surgeon in the flying camp army of the Revolution, praying relief, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill concerning the district of Brunswick, in the State of Georgia; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Peters and Sabin Pond, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the "Act for establishing trading houses with the Indian tribes."

[This bill provides that the Superintendent of Indian Trade, and agents and assistant agents for Indian affairs, be hereafter appointed by nomination to the Senate, and requires of each of those officers bond, with two securities, in the sum of $10,000, for the faithful discharge of their respective duties.]

The bill was passed to a second reading.

The resolution directing the publication and distribution of the journal and proceedings of the Convention which formed the present Constitution of the United States, was read a third time, the blank filled with one thousand, and the resolution was passed.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Ephraim Shaler, De Lafayette Wilcox, and Alphonso Wetmore, first lieutenants of the sixth regiment United States infantry, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. TAIT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the third section of an act, passed on the third day of March last past, entitled "An act to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory;" and of investing the Legislature of the Alabama Territory with power to regulate the Judiciary thereof, in such manner as it may deem expedient; and also of investing the highest grade of courts which may be established by the said Legislature with jurisdiction in all cases in which the United States shall be a party.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Friday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making further provision for repairing the public buildings;" and no amendment having been offered thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 19th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads to inquire into the expediency of establishing a certain post route; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 19th instant, for instructing the Committee on Naval Affairs to inquire into the expediency of establishing naval depots; and agreed thereto.

The resolution providing for the distribution of the sixth volume of the Laws of the United States among the members of the present Congress and Delegates of Territories who have not been supplied therewith, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of providing for the sale of land granted as a donation to actual settlers in the Ohio Company's purchase; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads, to whom was referred the petition of Alan Farquhar, and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act making appropriation for repairing certain roads therein described," together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee; and, on motion by Mr. LEAKE, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

The claim of the representatives of the late Caron de Beaumarchais having been recommended to the favorable consideration of the Legislature by my predecessor, in his Message to Congress of the 31st January last, and concurring in the sentiments therein expressed, I now transmit copies of a new representation relative to it, received by the Secretary of State from the Minister of France, and of a correspondence on the subject between the Minister of the United States at Paris and the Duke of Richelieu, enclosed with that representation.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, January 12, 1818.

The Message and accompanying documents were read.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the letter from Julie Plantou to the President of the Senate, proposing to sell to the United States an allegorical painting of the Treaty of Ghent, made report:

That, in the opinion of the committee, it is not expedient to purchase said painting for the United States.

The report was read.

WEDNESDAY, January 21.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Navy Department, transmitting, for the use of the members of the Senate, forty-two copies of the Naval Register for the year 1818, prepared in obedience to the resolution of December 13, 1815; and the letter was read.

Mr. NOBLE presented the petition of Loring A. Walder and others, praying the establishment of a post office in the town of Jacksonborough, Wayne county, State of Indiana, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate in what manner the troops in the service of the United States now operating against the Seminole tribe of Indians have been subsisted, whether by contract or otherwise, and whether they have been furnished regularly with rations.

Mr. DICKERSON presented the petition of Joshua Swain, and others, inhabitants of the county of Cape May, praying that a certain district of country, therein described, be made a port of entry; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. BARBOUR presented the petition of John Thompson, praying an allowance of interest on a sum of money which was found due to him on the books of the Treasury Department, by the accounting officers thereof; as stated in the petition; which was read. Whereupon, Mr. BARBOUR gave notice, agreeably to the joint rule, that, after the expiration of ten days, he should ask leave to bring in a bill in addition to an act for the relief of John Thompson.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Peters and Sabin Pond; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate took up and concurred in the report of the Committee of Pensions unfavorable to the petition of Ephraim Shaler, De La Fayette Wilcox, and Alphonso Wetmore, first lieutenants of the sixth regiment United States infantry, stating that, during the late war, while engaged in action with the enemy, they received several severe wounds, which occasioned to each the loss of an arm; that the loss and wounds subject them to daily pain and inconvenience, although the performance of their duty as officers of the Army has not been suspended on that account since their wounds healed; and soliciting the aid of Congress, so far as to confer on them a compensation equal to their sufferings and expense, by granting to them pensions from the date of their several wounds.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred a letter from Julie Plantou, to the President of the Senate, proposing to sell to the United States an allegorical painting of the Treaty of Ghent; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 20th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of amending the bill, entitled "An act to establish a separate Territorial government for the Eastern part of the Mississippi Territory; and agreed thereto.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from JAMES FRISK, notifying the resignation of his seat in the Senate; which was read.

On motion, by Mr. FROMENTIN, the President was requested to notify the Executive of the State of Vermont of this resignation.

The bill concerning the district of Brunswick, in the State of Georgia, was read the second time.

The bill directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, was read the second time.

The bill entitled "An act making further provision for repairing the public buildings," was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution providing for the distribution of certain laws; and it was referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army," together with the amendments thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act making appropriation for repairing certain roads therein described," together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee, which was disagreed to; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1818," and also a bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the arrearages which have been incurred for the support of the Military Establishment, previous to the first of January, 1817;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The two bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. MORROW, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire whether provision ought not to be made, to limit and control the issue and location of certificates for lands in lieu of those injured by earthquakes, in the county of New Madrid, in the Territory of Missouri.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to incorporate the Mechanic Relief Society of Alexandria; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

NAVAL DISCIPLINE.

nying documents, ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate. The report is as follows :

The Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom have been referred the memorial of certain commissioned officers of the Navy, under the rank of commanders, and also the memorial of certain officers of the Marine Corps attached to the Mediterranean squadron, have had the same under consideration, and report :

That your committee, duly impressed with the importance and delicacy of the subjects referred to them, and anxious to pursue that course which will best comport with the good of the public service and the high duties of the Senate, have given the several memorialists all the consideration to which they are entitled.

The memorialists of the Navy and Marine Corps pray that the Senate would institute an inquiry into the proceedings of two naval courts martial, had in the Mediterranean, in the early part of the last year. They complain that those proceedings were such as to impair their confidence in the tribunals which have been established by the laws of the country for the protection of the rights of all who are connected with the Naval Establishment.

The memorialists of the Marine Corps pray that their rights may be guarded by a special act of the Legislature, "or that the rules and regulations for the better government of the Navy be more strictly carried into execution."

Your committee sincerely regret that any circumstances should have occurred which have caused discontents among any portion of the officers of the United States Navy. They have indulged the hope that the high reputation and renown which had been acquired by the Naval Establishment of this country in war, would be cherished and sedulously guarded in the season of peace by every officer of the corps. It is only by a correct deportment, by a rigid discharge of duty, and a strict observance of the laws, that their well-earned fame can be preserved. If these observations are correct, as it regards the individuals, officers of the Navy, they must strongly apply to their tribunals. If naval courts martial, or courts of inquiry, have become so negligent, or so partial and unfaithful in the discharge of their duties, that those who look to them for protection can no longer confide in them, but must resort in the language of the memorialists, for safety "to those arms with which their country has intrusted them, or to that strength with which nature has endowed them," then, indeed, there is most serious cause of alarm. But your committee do not believe that this is the condition and character of your naval tribunals. They have heretofore been unimpeached. Under their administration the American Navy has attained a character, both at home and abroad, of which the nation is justly proud. In the instances complained of, there may have been some ground for criticism; the proceedings may have been such as not to give entire satisfaction to all; but your committee are decidedly of the opinion that whatever may be the character of the proceedings of the courts martial under consideration, they are beyond the control of the Senate. It has no power that can reach these cases. It has none other than legislative power touching these matters, which in its nature cannot be retrospective. The corrective in such cases is confided by the institutions of the country to the Chief Magistrate, and to that department of the Government would their complaints, perhaps, have been most properly addressed.

There is another view of the subject to which the committee have not been inattentive. It has been considered a fit occasion to look into the laws governing the Navy, in order to discover whether any defects exist which may require legislative correction. Your committee have done so, and, on examination, are of opinion that no legislative proceedings are necessary at this time. The rules and regulations for the government of the Navy, now in force, are those under which it has grown up and acquired a reputation for discipline and efficiency, which your committee believe is not surpassed by any similar establishment. In this state of things, they are of opinion that the causes of complaint, if any, are not in the laws, but in the administration of the laws. As it regards the marines, a description of force most necessary and useful, and which merits the fostering and protecting care of the Government, the committee, on examination, find that they are subject to do duty afloat and on shore, as the Executive, at his discretion, may direct; and that they are "governed by the same rules and articles of war, as are prescribed for the Military Establishment, and by the rules for the regulation of the Navy, heretofore, or which shall be established by law, according to the nature of the service in which they shall be employed." The committee know no footing more proper on which to place the marines than that on which the law has already placed them. Were new rules now to be prescribed for their government and protection, it is believed that none other ought to be prescribed than those which now exist. Your committee therefore repeat, that in their opinion, the defect, if any, is not in the law, but in its execution. Viewing, then, the subjects referred to them in all their bearings, feeling the danger of affecting that discipline which is the vital principle of all military establishments; while they would frown with indignation on every act which savored of oppression, or of maladministration, your committee respectfully submit the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be discharged from the further consideration of the memorial of the naval officers of the Mediterranean squadron, under the rank of commanders, and of the memorial of the officers of the Marine Corps, of date the 17th of January, 1817.

Documents accompanying the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, in the case of Commodore Perry and Captain Heath.

The memorial of the commissioned officers (of the Mediterranean squadron) under the rank of commanders, to the honorable the Senate of the United States, dated Port Mahon, January 20, 1817.

The undersigned, officers holding commissions in the Navy of the United States, beg leave most respectfully to state to the honorable the Senate of the United States, that, having entered the service early in life, from motives of love of their country, respect for its naval character, and a sincere wish to become useful, they would willingly encounter dangers of any kind, or endure any hardships which the good of the service or the preservation of discipline may make necessary; that, together with a willingness to risk their lives and sacrifice their comforts, they have heretofore felt a firm reliance on the protection which the well-digested laws of their country were intended, by the framers and enactors of them, to afford to officers of every grade, against the wanton exercise of that power which all military establishments must place in the hands of the superior over the subaltern. Guarding with cautious jealousy their reputation, and their rights against all assaults, which have not been designated by the law for the guardianship and arbitration of the most respectable of all tribunals, (a court martial,) they have witnessed, with the deepest regret, the proceedings on a late transaction which has been brought to the decision of a court composed of the eldest officers of this squadron, of officers who, from their rank in service, we had hoped would have proved as jealous guardians of our rights as of their own. We beg leave, respectfully, to state the leading circumstances of this case. Captain John Heath, commanding the detachment of marines on board of the frigate Java, under the command of Oliver H. Perry, Esq., was so unfortunate as to incur the displeasure of his commander. The merits of the case between these two officers we do not presume to canvass; but we are imperiously called upon to notice the subsequent events. A court martial convened in the harbor of Mahon, on board the Java, on the 31st of December, 1816, for the trial of Captain Heath, on charges and specifications, of which the following is a copy:

"CHARGE 1. Disrespectful, insolent, and contemptuous conduct to me, his superior officer. Specification 1. That he did, on or about the 22d of July, 1816, on board of the United States frigate Java, then standing into the Bay of Naples, on being asked by me "why a certain marine was suffered to appear on deck in so filthy and dirty a dress?" reply to me in an insolent, disrespectful, and contemptuous manner. Specification 2. That he did, late in the evening of the 18th of September, 1816, on board the United States frigate Java, then at anchor in the harbor of Messina, cause a letter, written by himself, and couched in language highly improper to be used towards his commanding officer, to be left on my table, in the cabin of said ship. Specification 3. That he did, when sent for into the cabin, and asked "why he took such a time to write me a letter of that kind?" assume a deportment towards me highly provoking and disrespectful. The aforesaid charge and specifications being in violation of a part of the 15th article, and a part of the 13th article of the rules and regulations for the better government of the Navy of the United States.

"CHARGE 2. Neglect of duty and unofficer-like conduct. Specification 1. That, on or about the evening of the 16th of September, 1816, on board the United States ship Java, then at anchor in the harbor of Messina, he, the said Captain John Heath, did, on two marines jumping overboard to swim from the ship, neglect to come on deck, although called and informed of this circumstance, alleging as a reason therefor the subtlety of his being sick. Specification 2. That he did, when ordered by me, at said time and place, to come on deck and muster the marines, execute that duty in a careless and indifferent manner; and, when the marines were mustered, did neglect to report to me until called and directed so to do. Specification 3. That he did neglect, on the desertion of said marines from the ship, to take those immediate steps for their recovery that became him as commanding officer of the detachment to which they belonged, and were required by the urgency of the case. This charge and specification being in violation of a part of the 20th article and the 28th article of the rules and regulations for the better government of the Navy of the United States.

"CHARGE 3. Disobedience of orders. Specification. That he did, at the time and place referred to in the 3d specification of 1st charge, though repeatedly ordered to be silent, continue to speak, although warned of the consequences, and in the same indecorous and contemptuous manner as is therein alleged, thereby violating a part of the 14th article of the rules and regulations for the better government of the Navy of the United States.

O. H. PERRY.

"U. S. SHIP JAVA,

"ALGIERES BAY, October 14, 1816."

Of these charges and specifications it will be necessary to observe only, that the offence on which the greatest stress is laid, was committed, as the specification states, on the 22d of July, 1816; that Captain Heath was neither arrested, suspended, nor warned that notice would be taken of this offence; that on the 16th of September, 1816, Captain Heath is again supposed by Captain Perry to commit an offence, for which Captain Perry suspends him from the exercise of the duties of his office; that in the interval between the commission of these two offences, a general court martial convenes in the Bay of Naples, of which Captain Perry is president, and Captain Heath a member; that after Captain Heath had been suspended from duty two days, he addressed a note to Captain Perry, of which the following is a copy:

"U. S. FRIGATE JAVA,
MESSINA, September 18, 1816.

"SIR: On the evening of the 16th instant I was ordered below by you from the quarter-deck of this ship, with these words, or to that effect, "I have no further use for your services on board this ship." I have waited until this moment to know why I have been thus treated; and, being ignorant of the causes, request my arrest and charges.

"Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

"JOHN HEATH, Captain of Marines."

The language of this note Captain Perry considered disrespectful, and summoned Captain Heath into his cabin. Willingly would your memorialists draw a veil over the transaction which then and there took place; most willingly would they bury in oblivion a transaction so disgraceful to the character of an American officer. But justice to themselves forbids it. It appears, by the statement of Captain Heath, and the acknowledgment of Captain Perry, that, after some conversation had passed, Captain Perry, from (as he says) "a disposition to chastise insolence on the spot," gave to Captain Heath a blow, and after having committed this outrage on his person, with much abusive language, ordered him to be confined to his room, and a sentinel placed over him; a measure which hitherto has been considered justifiable in extreme cases only. A little reflection convinced Captain Perry of the impropriety of his conduct, and alarmed him for its consequences; he accordingly, through the medium of another post captain and the first lieutenant of the Java, made an overture to Captain Heath of reconciliation, and through them tendered an apology, but insisted on terms of his own dictating. This, Captain Heath having a due regard for his own reputation, for the commission which he has the honor to hold, and for the respectability of his brother officers of the same rank, positively refused to accept, and in his turn preferred charges against Captain Perry. A court martial convened, and, as we have been unofficially informed, for the trial of both;

but Captain Perry remained in the exercise of the functions of his office, while Captain Heath was in close confinement. Of the proceedings of this court your memorialists know but little; they have ere this, they presume, been laid before the honorable Secretary of the Navy. But they know that Captain Perry has sailed for the United States, in command of the Java, with the sanction of a court martial, and that of the Commander-in-chief, to support his conduct.

The undersigned have now no guarantee for the safety of their persons, but the use of those arms which the laws of their country have placed in their hands, and that personal strength with which nature has blessed them. To those means they must resort, and on them in future depend, unless the honorable the Senate, to whom they look with filial confidence, as the guardians of their rights, will, by a timely interference, save them from the disagreeable alternative of relinquishing a profession to which they are enthusiastically attached, or becoming in every instance the defenders, not only of their character but of their persons. Placed at a distance from their country, and without the immediate influence of its civil laws, your memorialists rely with confidence on the decisions of the high tribunal to which they now solemnly appeal. Your memorialists trust it will not engross too much of the valuable time of the Senate to institute an examination into the proceedings of this court in these two instances. They beg leave also to state, that a case occurred at Naples, in August last, between Captain J. O. Creighton and Midshipman Marston, of the Washington, the decision on which they also consider as tending to destroy the conviction which every officer ought to feel while in the execution of the duties of his office, that the strong arm of the law is extended over him, equally for his protection during good conduct, and for his punishment when he deviates from its rules. If your memorialists have erred in making this appeal, they hope it will be attributed rather to an exuberance than a deficiency of good feeling; and they trust they will ever be found ready to obey the call, and support the cause of their country, in any contest, however unpromising to themselves as individuals.

And your memorialists, as in duty bound, will ever pray.

The officers of the United States Marine Corps, in the Mediterranean, present the following memorial to the honorable Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, and pray that their situation on board ship, and the grievances herein complained of, may claim their serious attention.

The want of established rules and regulations for the Marine Corps, when stationed on board ship, and this difference of discipline in different vessels, have always been productive of serious ills, and have too frequently occasioned unavoidable and unhappy disturbances. The undersigned, therefore, do earnestly entreat, that rules and regulations be established by an act of Congress, wherein the duties of marine officers, when afloat, may be clearly and distinctly defined, and rights and privileges protected.

The undersigned regret the necessity under which they conceive themselves bound, by their duty to the service and themselves, of entreating the honorable Senate and House of Representatives, as the guardians and protectors of their rights, to examine the decision of a court martial held at Mahon, on Captain Oliver H. Perry, of the Navy, under the charges of outraging the rights, feelings, and person of the commanding officer of marines of the United States frigate Java, and pray that the protection of their rights and persons be guaranteed by some special act of Congress; or that the rules and regulations for the better government of the Navy be more strictly carried into execution.

Hon. BENJ. W. CROWNSHIELD,

PORT MAHON, May 4, 1817.

SIR: We, the undersigned, captains and commanders, serving in the squadron under your orders, have heard, with deep regret, that many of the lieutenants, and other commissioned officers, belonging to the vessels under our respective commands, have forwarded to the honorable the Senate of the United States, a memorial, which, in our opinion, is calculated to excite disaffection and insubordination in the Navy, and bring into contempt a service heretofore distinguished for its reputation, order, and good government.

The undersigned wish to be distinctly understood that it is not against petitioning the Legislature for a redress of real wrongs that we now protest, but against the manner, time, and object, of the memorialists, which, if truly represented to us, are as follow: They complain that they have been oppressed, and require that the thirtieth article of an act for the better government of the Navy should be revised, and so amended as to designate particularly the punishment of offenders; and it is believed that they even go so far as to threaten, that, should their imaginary grievances not be redressed, they will resort to their arms for protection. It is also understood that the memorialists have presumed to reflect on the members of two courts martial, composed of officers of long standing in the Navy, that their meetings have been held with apparent secrecy, and the memorial studiously withheld from their commanders, who would readily sanction any measure having for its object the good of the service. It cannot be denied that it is the bounden duty of officers, more especially when on a foreign station, to cultivate towards each other the most perfect harmony and good will; but it is the opinion of the undersigned, that the conduct of the memorialists is calculated to have a contrary effect. The undersigned are therefore impelled, by a sacred sense of duty we owe to our country and ourselves, to request that you will be pleased to remove all those officers from under our respective commands, as soon as the public service will admit of the same, as we cannot but consider the signers of the memorial as having forfeited all claims to our confidence, and their example as endangering the vessels intrusted to our charge.

We have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your obedient servants,

WILLIAM M. CRANE,
J. ORDE CREIGHTON,
GEORGE W. RODGERS,

THURSDAY, January 22.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 11th of December, 1817, relative to the progress which has been made in the settlement of public accounts, under the "Act to provide for the prompt settlement of public accounts;" and as to what further legal provisions may be necessary to insure the speedy settlement of those accounts; and the report was read.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred a resolution of the Senate, directing them to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for enforcing the attendance of witnesses before courts martial, made report; which was read.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of passing a law, to vest, in the State of Ohio, the power of selling the remaining thirty-five sections of land, in the six miles reservation at the Scioto salt works, and applying the proceeds of the sale to such purposes, for the use of the State, as the Legislature thereof may think proper.

Mr. CAMPBELL presented the memorial of the judges of the circuit court of the United States, for the District of Columbia, praying an increase of salary, for reasons therein stated; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. OTIS presented the memorial of Israel Thorndike, of Boston, formerly of Beverly, in the district of Massachusetts, praying the benefit of drawback on certain goods exported by him, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the memorial of William P. Farrand, and others, importing merchants of the city of Philadelphia, praying that some legislative provision may be made, whereby the importing merchants of that city may import merchandise into, or by way of a neighboring port, more especially New York or Baltimore, on giving bonds, with satisfactory sureties, for the payment of the duties in Philadelphia, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of Thomas Hall Jervey, surveyor of the port of Charleston, in the State of South Carolina, praying a proportion of the forfeiture of the privateer schooner Lovely Cordelia, arrested by him for a violation of the act interdicting the slave trade, and prosecuted to condemnation, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the establishment of additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri," reported the same, with amendments; which were read.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed, by an order of the Senate, to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States, a sum equal to the salary of the judge of the district court of South Carolina, for the term of one year, during which time the said circuit judge was compelled by law to perform the duties of the judge of said district court, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That no compensation in addition to his regular stated salary, ought to be allowed to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States, for any duties devolved upon, and performed by him in consequence of the disability of the district judge of South Carolina.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. TICHENOR submitted the following motions for consideration:

Resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying so much of the second section of the act establishing the Military Staff, as relates to hospital surgeons and hospital surgeons' mates, and to the appointment of judge advocates.

Resolved, That the Military Committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of a reform, in the provisions of the laws, respecting the emoluments and allowances to the Military and Staff officers of the Army, in order to place them on a more economical establishment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 21st instant, for requesting information in what manner the troops in the service of the United States, now operating against the Seminole tribe of Indians, have been subsisted; and agreed thereto.

The bill to incorporate the Mechanic Relief Society of Alexandria, was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of the arrearages which have been incurred for the support of the Military Establishment previous to the first of January, 1817," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1818," was read the second time, and referred to the same committee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill concerning the district of Brunswick, in the State of Georgia; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Saturday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the report of the commissioners on claims to land in the district West of Pearl river; and also the register of claims to lands in the district East of Pearl river, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands, to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act in addition to an act making appropriation for repairing certain roads therein described," was read a third time, and the blanks were filled each with "five thousand." The bill was then passed.

FRIDAY, January 23.

Mr. FROMENTIN presented the memorial of Jairus Loomis and James Bassett, sailing-masters in the Navy of the United States, praying a portion of the value of the articles captured in a negro fort on the river Appalachicola, which was destroyed by two gun vessels under their command, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John Keemle, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Forrest, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Isaac Briggs, made report; which was read.

He also reported a bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 22d instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of vesting in the State of Ohio the power of selling the remaining thirty-five sections of land, in the six miles reservation at the Scioto salt works, and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motions of the 22d instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs, in relation to the military staff officers of the Army; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, in relation to an allowance of compensation to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for enforcing the attendance of witnesses before courts martial; and, an amendment having been proposed thereto by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, the further consideration thereof was postponed until next Monday week.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate the Mechanic Relief Society of Alexandria; and on motion by Mr. BERRILL, the bill was re-committed to the Committee on the District of Columbia, with instructions to report a clause limiting the amount of real and personal property which may be holden by the society, and restraining said society from entering into any banking or commercial operations; and also that it contain a provision that Congress may, at any time, alter or repeal this act.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the last mentioned bill, reported the same, with an amendment; which was read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes; and, the bill having been amended, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making provision for the establishment of additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands. The amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was read a third time as amended.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petitions of Joseph Cumming, administrator of James Murren, and Samuel Parker, executor of George Parker, deceased, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, January 26.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary for the Department of War, comprehending contracts made by that Department in the year 1817, and those made by the Purchasing and Ordnance departments, for the same period, in compliance with "An act concerning public contracts," passed April 21, 1808; and the report was read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motions of the 22d instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of repealing or modifying so much of the act establishing the military staff as relates to hospital surgeons and hospital surgeons' mates; and of a reform in the provisions of the laws, respecting the emoluments and allowances to the military and staff officers of the Army, in order to place them on a more economical establishment, and agreed thereto.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the petition of Thomas Golden, and others, praying the grant of a certain fractional section of land on the west fork of White river, to include the falls on said river, with a sufficient title, to John Allen and James G. Read, for the purpose of erecting mills thereon, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the petition of John Keemle, and in concurrence therewith, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States, a sum equal to the salary of the judge of the district court of South Carolina, for the term of one year, during which time the said circuit judge was compelled by law to perform the duties of the judge of said district court; and, on motion by Mr. SMITH, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause a statement of expenditures upon the public buildings, and an account of their progress, to be annually laid before Congress at the commencement of each session.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, on the memorial of certain commissioned officers of the Navy, under the rank of commanders; and also the memorial of certain officers of the Marine Corps attached to the Mediterranean squadron; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Wednesday next.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the "Act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes;" and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill concerning the district of Brunswick, in the State of Georgia; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. DAGGETT presented the petition of Martin Warner, of Derby, in the State of Connecticut, praying an allowance of bounty on a certain fishing voyage, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and the bill having been amended, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. SANFORD presented the petition of Timothy Rossiter and others, who served as officers and soldiers during the Revolutionary war, as therein stated, praying relief; and the petition was read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Forrest; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to incorporate the Mechanic Relief Society of Alexandria, together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on the District of Columbia; and the amendment having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petitions of Joseph Cumming, administrator of James Murren, and Samuel Parker, executor of George Parker, deceased; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petitioners ought not to be granted.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Peters and Sabin Pond.

On motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, to amend the resolution, by striking out after the word "That," to the end thereof, and inserting, "a bill be reported, authorizing the petitioners to have the benefit of a hearing before the Secretary of the Treasury, in the same manner as if a condemnation of their property had not occurred, so far as respects the moiety of the forfeiture vested in the United States," it was determined in the negative—yeas 8, nays 25, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Ashmun, Burrill, Daggett, Hunter, King, Morrill, Otis, and Roberts.

NAYS—Messrs. Campbell, Crittenden, Dickerson, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Leake, Macon, Morrow, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Troup, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

And, in concurrence with the report, it was resolved that the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petition.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to supply vacancies under commissions of bankruptcy," in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson;" and, on motion by Mr. DAGGETT, the further consideration thereof was postponed until this day two weeks.

TUESDAY, January 27.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill in addition to an act giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the petition of Jeremiah Gregory and others, praying to be permitted to purchase the public lands on which they live, and which they have improved, at the price fixed by law; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. TAYLOR also presented the petition of the executrix and executors of Touissant Dubois, deceased, praying to be permitted to locate claims of land, which have been confirmed, on such parts of the reserve tract as may be vacant; and the petition was read, and referred to the same committee.

Mr. NOBLE presented the petition of Hugh May, of Indiana, late an ensign in the United States Army, praying reimbursement of expenses attending the prosecution of a suit instituted against him by a recruit under his command, who was liberated on a writ of habeas corpus, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Secretary of the Treasury.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Forrest; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until Friday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The bill, entitled "An act to supply vacancies under commissions of bankruptcy," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill, entitled "An act making provision for the establishment of additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri," was read a third time as amended, and passed with amendments.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of William G. Ridgely, of Georgetown, in the District of Columbia, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and it was referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a statement from the Treasury Department, showing the amount of duty which accrued on salt imported during the years 1815 and 1816, and from the 1st of January, to the 30th of June, 1817, together with the amount paid for bounty on pickled fish exported, and for allowances to vessels employed in the fisheries, during that period; with instructions to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law laying that duty, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is not expedient to repeal the law imposing a duty on salt.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. TROUP gave notice that, to-morrow, he should ask leave to bring in a bill for the relief of Richard M. Johnson.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Jos. Bevan, of Georgia, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred a resolution, directing "that the Commissioner of the General Land Office furnish each soldier who may receive a patent for military bounty land, a description of the quality of his lot, as minutely in the field notes of the surveyor," made a report thereon; which was read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and the bill having been further amended, on motion by Mr. DAGGETT, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. TALBOT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so far changing the present judicial system of the United States, as to provide for the gradual diminution of the number of the judges who at present compose the Supreme Court, for restricting the functions and duties of the judges of that court, to the holding the sessions thereof, and the other duties incidental thereto; of establishing and organizing a circuit court in each of the United States in which a circuit court has not heretofore been established, and of providing for the appointment of a competent number of circuit judges for the holding the circuit courts of the United States.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to alter and amend an act, approved the 3d day of March, 1817, entitled "An act to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. OTIS submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee of Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the examination and allowance of moneys paid by the State of Massachusetts for the supplies and services of the militia of that State employed during the late war, in the common defence, so far as the same may be due upon principles of equity and justice.

The Senate then adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, January 28.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the petition of Abraham Wiseman, and others, of the State of Indiana, praying permission to alter their entries of lands, which have been erroneously marked; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to increase the salaries of the judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the Committee to whom was referred the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives in Congress, and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, reported the same, with the following amendment: "Strike out the whole of the resolution after the enacting clause, and, insert in lieu thereof, the following:

"That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States, which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of the States, shall be valid, to all intents and purposes, as a part of the said Constitution—

"That, for the purpose of choosing Representatives in the Congress of the United States, each State shall, by its Legislature, be divided into a number of districts, equal to the number of Representatives to which such State may be entitled. The districts shall be formed of contiguous territory, and contain, as nearly as may be, an equal number of persons, entitled by the Constitution to be represented. In each district the persons qualified to vote shall choose one Representative. That, for the purpose of choosing Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, the persons qualified to vote for Representatives in each district shall choose one Elector. The two additional Electors, to which each State is entitled, shall be appointed in such manner as the Legislature thereof may direct. The Electors, when convened, at the time and place prescribed by law, for the purpose of voting for President and Vice President of the United States, shall have power, in case any of them shall fail to attend, to choose an Elector, or Electors, in place of him or them so failing to attend. The division of States into districts, as hereby provided for, shall take place immediately after this amendment shall be adopted; and afterwards, whenever a census shall be taken, and an apportionment of Representatives under it shall be made; and the same shall not be altered, until a subsequent census shall have been taken, and an apportionment of Representatives under it shall have been made."

Mr. ASHMUN submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the security of passengers in stage coaches, in which the mail of the United States may be transported, against danger arising from gross negligence of proprietors and drivers.

nance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the payment of arrearages which have been incurred for the support of the Military Establishment, previous to the first of January, one thousand eight hundred and seventeen," reported the same with an amendment, which was read; and the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole; and the amendment having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, the amendment was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was read a third time as amended.

The engrossed bill concerning the district of Brunswick, in the State of Georgia, was read a third time, and passed.

The engrossed bill to incorporate the Mechanic Relief Society of Alexandria, was read a third time, the blank being filled with "forty thousand dollars," and passed.

The engrossed bill directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes, was read a third time; the blank was filled first, with "first of April next;" second, with "first of March, 1819," and the bill was passed.

The bill for the relief of Isaac Briggs was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of certain commissioned officers of the Navy, under the rank of commanders; and also the memorial of certain officers of the Marine Corps, attached to the Mediterranean squadron; and, on motion by Mr. BARBOUR, the consideration thereof was further postponed, until next Monday week.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States a certain salary, for having performed the duties of the judge of the district court of South Carolina; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until Wednesday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a statement from the Treasury Department, showing the amount of duty which accrued on salt imported during the years 1815 and 1816, and from the 1st of January, to the 30th June, 1817; together with the amount paid for bounty on pickled fish exported, and for allowances to vessels employed in the fisheries during that period, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law laying that duty; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph Bevan of Georgia, and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the twenty-seventh instant, for instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of changing the present judicial system of the United States; which being amended, was agreed to, as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of so far changing the present judicial system of the United States, as to provide for the gradual diminution of the judges who at present compose the Supreme Court; for the restricting the functions and duties of the judges of that court to the holding the sessions thereof, and the other duties incidental thereto; of establishing and organizing a circuit court in each State in the Union, in which a circuit court has not heretofore been established; and of providing for the appointment of a competent number of circuit judges for the holding the circuit courts of the United States.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion, of the 26th instant, for requesting a statement of expenditures upon the public buildings, and an account of their progress, to be annually laid before Congress, at the commencement of each session; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 27th instant, for instructing the Committee of Claims to inquire into the expediency of providing for the examination and allowance of moneys paid by the State of Massachusetts, for the supplies and services of the militia of that State; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Friday next.

The bill, in addition to an act, giving pensions to the orphans and widows of persons slain in the public or private armed vessels of the United States, was read the second time.

The bill to alter and amend an act approved the 3d day of March, 1817, entitled "An act to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory," was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to divide the State of Pennsylvania into two judicial districts; and the bill having been further amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution directing that the Commissioner of the General Land Office furnish to each soldier who may receive a patent for military bounty land, a description of the quality of his lot, as minuted on the field notes of the surveyor; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and on the question, "Shall this resolution be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the negative.

THURSDAY, January 29.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary for the Department of War, exhibiting the names of the clerks employed in the several offices attached to that Department, and the sum given to each for the year 1817; and the report was read.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of John Hall, late a major in the Marine Corps of the United States, praying relief in the settlement of his accounts, in consequence of his having been robbed of a certain sum of money, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, the Message of the President of the United States, communicated the 20th instant, respecting the claim of the heirs of Caron de Beaumarchais, together with the accompanying documents, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 28th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire into the expediency of providing for the security of passengers in stage coaches; which, being amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for the security of passengers in stage coaches, in which the mail of the United States may be transported, against danger arising from gross negligence of proprietors and drivers.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on Finance relative to the duty on salt; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until Monday next.

The bill to increase the salaries of the judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia, was read the second time.

SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. KING took a comprehensive view of the principal features of the bill, stated his objections to the provision it proposed for seamen, militia, &c., and concluded by moving that the bill be recommitted, and the committee instructed to amend the same, so as to confine its provisions to a grant of half pay for life to the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army on the Continental establishment, who served for three years, or until the end of the war, including those who were entitled, under any resolve of Congress, to half pay for life; the half pay so to be granted, to be ascertained by the rank according to which the accounts of the respective officers were finally settled.

Mr. BARBOUR followed, and, after arguing at some length to show the impossibility of providing for all included in the bill, and the impracticability of discriminating between the different classes provided for, moved an indefinite postponement of the bill.

Mr. SMITH said, that, during the discussion of this question, the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) and the gentleman from Massachusetts, (Mr. OTIS,) had contended for the first honors of the Revolution, in the acts of the rival compatriots, Mr. Henry and Mr. Adams. Mr. S. said, if South Carolina could not boast of having been first in the Revolution, he could confidently say she was not the least, nor yet the last. She had performed her ample share. But, if he was to decide to whom the first honor was due, he would say to that band of patriots, who, regardless of the consequences, entered the British ships in Boston harbor and threw the tea overboard. This was the first efficient operation, and posterity would look back upon it with grateful recollection.

Mr. S. said he was well aware of the disadvantages under which he should address the Senate, on the merits of the bill, and the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING;) as what he should urge, he plainly perceived, would be in direct opposition to the general sentiment that prevailed in the House, as he was decidedly opposed to the general principles of the bill, as well as to the amendment. If either ought to prevail, he would prefer the bill. The amendment, he thought, was entirely inadmissible. It had for its object a special provision for the officers of the Revolutionary army, in the Continental line, to the utter exclusion, not only of the soldiers of the army, but of the militia of every description; many of whom bore a distinguished part in the contest for the independence of this nation. The bill, as it came from the House of Representatives, was more liberal; it makes provision for the soldiers as well as officers; although it makes no provision for the militia, the bulwark of the nation. It also provides for the distressed seamen and marines of the Revolution. But, says the gentleman who offers this amendment, the seamen and marines, as well as their officers, were well provided for; they were entitled to the prize money. The naval force of the United States, at that time, was very inconsiderable. It consisted of two or three frigates, a few sloops, and a few privateers, which had to contend with one of the greatest maritime Powers in the world. The consequence of which was, instead of enriching themselves, most of them fell into the hands of the enemy, who threw them into prison-ships and dungeons, where many of them lingered out a miserable life, and perished. And such as did survive, with a few accidental exceptions, were left poor.

We are told we cannot provide for all, as the state of the Treasury will not admit of it; and the officers are to be selected as the only objects of the public bounty. And we are told as a reason for this preference, that something is due to the rank they hold in society, and that some distinction must be made between men. This is a language not known to our Constitution. It may do in private life, if a man is disposed to select his society; but, when we are called upon to legislate on the subject, we ought to know of no distinction. It is repugnant to the principles of our Government, and at war with good sense and public justice.

What is the object of this provision? Why, it is said, to relieve the indigent and necessitous; and our benevolence, our sympathies, and our gratitude, are called upon to prompt us to this duty. This is a strange sort of reasoning. Benevolence, sympathy, and gratitude, can draw no line between the officer and the soldier, when both have served their country, and both are indigent. The tide of pity swells as high for the sufferings of the indigent and necessitous soldier, as it can do for the indigent and necessitous officer, if we are really governed by pity. The morsel you intend to bestow will be as sweet to the one as it is to the other. Several gentlemen have told us we must wait, and feel our way; and if, in future, we should find we are able, then the soldiers might be provided for. If the principle is correct, and the claim is a just one, why not provide for both at the same time? This procrastinating, timid policy, which so lately brought this country to the brink of ruin, and from which you were roused by the people, is not so well suited to their genius. They are more magnanimous; and if there exists a debt of justice, or even a debt of gratitude, which their country is bound to discharge, they will submit to be taxed to enable the Government to pay it. The Government is now one hundred millions in debt, and because there is a little money in the Treasury, not immediately wanted, we are endeavoring to establish a pension system to get rid of it, and pave the way, when our debts become due, for laying another tax in the place of the one you have just repealed. Mr. S. was in favor of repealing the internal taxes. It was right to do so. But can we believe the public mind is prepared to pay a tax to maintain a pension system, because it is said that those officers cannot submit to any industrious pursuits for a living? There are thousands of poor who are unable to work that demand your attention in an equal degree. And are you prepared to put all your poor on the pension list?

It is said this is a just debt; that, under the confederated Government, Congress had engaged to make these officers half-pay for life; which they were induced to commute for five years' full pay; and that this five years' full pay was discharged in certificates, which fell a prey to speculation; and the Government ought to pay them over again. As respects those Revolutionary officers, the Government has acted with perfect good faith. It performed with fidelity all its engagements, as far as it had ever promised, or as far as any hope or expectation had been raised or excited, and that at the earliest possible period within its power, after the conclusion of peace. It was well known that the United States had not the means of paying its army immediately at the close of a seven years' war, in gold or silver. But it is as well known that they did not pay that army in depreciated Continental money. That had gone to oblivion in the hands of those who had given support to the army. Their full pay for real service performed, as well as for five years' full pay after their service terminated, was liquidated and settled at the specie standard; and Government certificates given, which bore interest from the date; and the faith of the nation was most solemnly pledged to redeem them.

With this view the Government, among its earliest acts after the adoption of the Federal Constitution, established the funding system; and these very certificates were worth twenty-six shillings in the pound, and at that price this nation redeemed them. If there was a speculation, the Government had no hand in it. On the contrary, whilst it suffered every other species of public security to perish in the hands of the meritorious holder, it gave a distinguished sanction to these claims, and paid them with scrupulous punctuality. No speculations took place as regarded these certificates until after the funding system was established. These officers were then apprized of their rights, and if they did not think fit to protect them, the Government could not be blamed. Speculations did run high at that time, but the officers were not the victims of it; the soldiers were the persons who fell a sacrifice to its ravages. Many of these officers are honorable men, and stand superior to any such charge; yet it is a fact not to be denied, that many of them enriched themselves by speculating, in their turn, on the poor soldiers, in buying their certificates and land warrants at very reduced prices. It was not in the power of the Government, nor was it the duty of Government, to guard against the speculations that succeeded. It is a monster that pervades every quarter, and almost every department, and if it was the duty of Government to repair its ravages, the treasures of Peru would not be adequate to the demand.

But, Mr. S. said, upon the most mature consideration, he was opposed to both the bill and amendment in any form in which they could be presented. Because he believed no particular merit could be ascribed to any particular portion of the people of the United States, for services rendered during the Revolutionary war, in exclusion to any other portion who espoused that cause. It was as essential, and as indispensable, to the support and maintenance of that war, that many of your citizens should have been engaged in other spheres, and employed in other occupations, as it was that you should have had an army to fight your battles. And one could have been as well dispensed with as the other. This was not a war carried on in your enemy's country, nor were those officers and soldiers sent from home into a foreign country, where they alone were forced to fight your battles, and undergo the toils of war, without any regard. But this was a war of a very different character. This was a war brought by the enemy into your own country; a war brought to every man's door, and in which every man was obliged to take an active part in some shape or other. Yet every man could not be in the Army. This was a war of a different character from all other wars. It was a war for liberty and independence, in which every soul was engaged, and in which every one contributed, by every means in his power, or your independence would have failed, even if your army had been five times as strong as it was.

This was not a mercenary army; not one officer was there for the sake of money; but to do his duty. And it is to be recollected, on this occasion, as in the late war, there was a great solicitude for commissions. It was not only the post of honor, but often a place of safety. Other portions of your citizens were active in the public councils, without whose bold and high-toned measures, taken at the hazard of their lives and fortunes, your army would have sunk into insignificance. Whilst others, from a pure love for their country, fed and clothed your armies, supplied them with wagons and horses, and everything else which they could furnish for its use, without any compensation. By their means, and by their means alone, you were enabled to carry on a seven years' war, without money or credit; a thing unparalleled in the history of any other nation upon earth. They had the ostentatious show of being paid for it in Continental money; which fell dead in their hands, without a single effort on the part of the Government to redeem it. By your Continental money, thousands of the most devoted friends of the Revolution, who lived in affluence and comfort, sunk their whole fortunes in its cause, and are now living in penury and want, with no other consolation than that of dying poor in the cause of their country. They yielded to their misfortunes without a murmur, believing that all were bound to give their aid, and satisfied they had given their full portion. And, because they were not in the Continental army; they have no credit for all those sacrifices. Of what use could an army have been, if this aid had not been afforded, and in this particular way? for you had no other possible means of subsisting it. This was the very life and soul of the army, and the very life and soul of the cause in which they were employed. Without it your army could have done nothing, and you would yet have been under the British Government. It is a maxim brought from another science, which applies as well to governments as to individuals, that you ought to be just before you are liberal. Before you speak of liberality to the Continental officers, redeem your Continental money, and relieve that numerous class of men, widows, and orphans, on whom it has entailed so much misery and poverty. They have a strong claim upon your liberality, your gratitude, and your justice, although they do not assemble around you, in this Hall, as Belisarius, who is presented in your lobby, leaning on his staff, at the moment this subject is called up, as if your cool and impartial judgment stood in need of this artificial aid.

Several gentlemen have, with much confidence, asserted that we are exclusively indebted to the Continental army; that the civil and religious liberty we so pre-eminently enjoy, are the fruits of their toils. Mr. S. said, he was sensible of the great merit of that army; and believed they had done a great deal in the cause of liberty, yet, he had no hesitation in declaring, that they had not done more than they ought to have done; nor had they done more than fell to the lot of every American devoted to his country. That army did not meet the common foe, and repel him from your borders with its single army, and leave all the rest of the community at ease and security under its protecting banners. Gentlemen who believe so, if there any such, know but little of the character of the Revolutionary war, or the manner in which it was carried on, in the three Southern States of North Carolina, and Georgia. They are perfect strangers to the sufferings and privations, as well as the exertions and patriotism of the people of those States; not of such as belonged to the Continental army, during their worst times there was no such army there, but of the volunteers and patriots, who, inspired with an invincible love of liberty, were determined not to yield. All the Continental army was in the Northern States, even to the troops which had been raised in the Southern States, except a few who were occasionally sent, and who were defeated as soon as they came, and which gave no sort of security to the property, the persons, or the lives of the inhabitants.

Mr. S. said, it was impossible for gentlemen to know the character of that war in the South, unless they had been there to witness it, and he saw but one gentleman in the Senate, (Mr. Macon of North Carolina) besides himself, who had. All the rest were remote from the scene of action, or had since grown up. So it was in the House of Representatives, where this bill originated. Though much distinguished for their talents and worth, yet most of them also were remote, or have been born since that war commenced. Its true character can never be learned from history. The historian never has, nor never will, record many of the most striking events, which so much distinguished it from all other wars, and which so distinguished it as carried on in that section. The historian acquires his knowledge from sources, in most cases, as uninformed as himself, and often bestows the laurels on heroes who never fought the battles. He was not himself far enough advanced in life to bear an active part in the operations of the war, but was old enough to observe all the passing events, and had a perfect recollection of them.

All the Continental troops sent to the southward, previous to 1781, were totally defeated. General Lincoln lost several successive battles, and never gained one, and was, with his whole force, finally taken prisoner. General Gates, who succeeded him, shamefully fled at the fire of the first gun, and left the citizens to the mercy of the enemy. These successive defeats left the country entirely exposed. The British not only supported their whole army for two years, by plundering indiscriminately from all who refused to take protection, their cattle, their hogs, their sheep, their corn, rice, and forage of every kind, but they turned loose the savage Indians upon the defenceless frontiers, who butchered them without regard to age or sex. By these disasters, the Tory parties, that everywhere infested the country, became increased, and, with a fury more unrelenting, and no less savage than the Indians, plundered, burned, and murdered wherever they went; and the whole country became a perfect scene of internal warfare. They not only stole and plundered to supply the enemy, but wantonly burned and destroyed to distress the country; they waylaid and murdered the Whigs wherever they found them; sometimes murdered them amidst their families, with their wives and children around them, begging in vain for mercy. They burned up their houses and plantations, and with them everything that could give comfort or support to the distressed women and children, who were reduced to a morsel of bread, and very often could not get that. The British army pervaded the whole country, and, wherever they went, left destruction in their train. That whole country was a wide waste; nothing presented itself but ruins, poverty, and distress. The cultivation of the fields, in many places, was left entirely to the women and children. Plundered of every hog, horse, cow, and everything else for their support, many mothers and daughters, who had seen better times, were obliged to lay down their domestic employments, and go to the fields and work like slaves, without the aid of a horse to plough, to raise a little corn to subsist themselves and their little children; and very often even this hard-earned morsel was plundered from them, or destroyed by the enemy. This picture may appear to be exaggerated, but there are many who know it to be correct, and who remember it with bitter regret.

Whilst their women and children were left in this forlorn situation, the men sought their safety by embodying in such parties as circumstances would allow. If they could not collect a hundred, they could collect fifty, if not fifty, twenty, or ten, or five. Armed with their rifles, with more than veteran bravery, they hung upon the borders of the British army wherever they went; sometimes firing upon the whole army, or cutting off their foraging parties, and circumscribing their ravages, to their great annoyance; and they became the scourge of the Tories in all quarters. This was the foundation of that military force which proved so formidable to the British arms, and gave them the first check in the Southern States. After losing all hopes of any relief from the Continental army, they threw themselves under Campbell, Cleveland, Shelby, Hill, and others, without one Continental officer or soldier among them, and totally defeated Colonel Ferguson, the best partisan officer in the British army, at the battle of King's Mountain. It was this character of men, who, under Colonel Pickens, as their commander, composed two-thirds of that inferior force, General Morgan's detachment, which completely defeated the British legions and infantry, under Colonel Tarleton, at the Cowpens; and this officer never had been defeated before.

Can it be said these men owe their independence to the Continental army, for whom you are now about to provide? Whether you consider them as patriots, or soldiers, or as sufferers or conquerors, they are entitled to as distinguished a rank as any portion of the Continental army during the Revolution. When these transactions were fresh, and their importance and worth well understood, there was a public opinion, competent to decide, that did them justice. But, when thirty-six years have elapsed, like everything else, not performed by great men, they are forgotten.

Gentlemen have spoken of the militia service as of very little importance during the war; and seem to exclude entirely from any merit all but the Continental army and its officers; and one gentleman has intimated they could not be trusted as regards their veracity and honor. Who fought your battles, sir, before you had a Continental army? Who fought your battles at Lexington, at Concord, and at Bunker's Hill, at the first dawn of the Revolution, that, like the electric spark, pervaded every rank, and gave a tone to the war that only ended with it? These warriors were your militia, collected upon the spur of the occasion, from their shops, and their domestic and rural pursuits; and, roused by the eloquent and immortal Warren, and his compatriots, they displayed an intrepidity not surpassed by your Continental army. Who fought and dispersed that numerous and formidable body of Tories, on Cape Fear, in North Carolina, who were corrupting the minds of all around them? It was the militia, collected upon a single day's notice, who, with their provisions and their blankets on their backs, marched to the scene of action, under General Caswell, with a promptness unknown to any but freemen, and defeated their enemy without the loss of a man, or without costing the Government a single farthing, and restored peace and order to that country for a long time after.

Who defended Charleston on the memorable 28th of June, 1775, before you had any Continental army there? Where the whole British fleet, consisting of two fifty gun ships, several frigates, and a number of smaller armed vessels, were repelled, and some of them burned. The enemy, after a battle of ten hours, were obliged to retire with great loss on their part, and very little on the part of the Americans. The inhabitants of that city contributed much to this defence, and, but for General Moultrie, the whole garrison would have been surrendered by General Lee, who was the superior officer, and who, it is to be recollected, was a Continental officer. Who composed the active corps under Sumter, Hampton, and Middleton? Those gallant men were inferior to none, and did more good than all the Continental soldiers you ever had there. Yet there was not a Continental soldier among them; nor does one of them come within the provisions of this bill. Marion raised his men within the British lines; their food was what they could catch, the earth was their bed, and the heavens their covering, and the swamps and marshes were their strong-hold. These men were in this service for more than a year; they fought more battles, gained more victories, killed more British and Tories, in proportion to their own number, than any other class of men upon the continent; and gave more relief to the Americans, and more annoyance to the enemy. These brave fellows never cost their country so much as a single charge of powder; they furnished even their own arms, and they used them like heroes. "These were times that tried men's souls." The Government gave them no pay, and they are excluded from its bounty by the bill before you. These men are not indebted to the Continental army for their independence.

In the two celebrated battles of Guilford and Eutaw Springs, under General Greene, a considerable part of his men were militia. Although there were Continental troops among them that distinguished themselves with great bravery, yet the number was very small; and the militia, and especially at Eutaw Springs, were not inferior to the Continental troops, and did more service. These were said to be the best fought battles during the war. While these scenes were going on in the Carolinas, Georgia, under Clarke, Williamson, and others, was a perfect scene of bloodshed. Notwithstanding all this, they are called ephemeral, and we are told the militia cannot be relied on either as respects their bravery or their honor. Sir, among these militia, there were men as honorable as ever breathed, and as brave as ever drew a sword. And the Government is as much indebted to them for their bravery, perseverance and sufferings, and owes them as much protection and support, as any portion of the Continental army.

The principle of gratitude has been strongly pressed. It is said we are reproached with ingratitude by the European nations. And what is it they have not said to reproach us? They have said we are barbarous, savage and ignorant; incapable of governing ourselves; that all Republican Governments have fallen; and that we have been ungrateful to our armies. And it was only since the late war, the common people of Europe knew we were white men. But, they have at last found out that we are not only white, but that our Government has some energy. And if they will compare what we have done for our army, with the condition of their own, they will find also that we are grateful. The Kings and Princes of Europe sometimes sell their armies to one another to fight their battles abroad—or they hire them for a job; and all that are not returned, are paid for at a stipulated price. The Hessian troops, attached to the British army during our Revolutionary war, were hired on these terms. However, if any are returned, that are worn out in service, they are stowed into an hospital for the remainder of their days, but they get nothing else. If there is a favorite officer, he is converted into a lord, and a large pension is settled upon him, and his heirs; and the people are taxed to support them. It is the pensioner who complains of our ingratitude, and not the farmer and mechanic who pay the tax.

This Government gave to each Continental soldier, at the close of the war, his pay for services, and a valuable tract of land, which was giving him the best means in the world to enable him to live happy. It paid the Continental officers for all their services rendered, and five years' full pay after the war had ended; and gave each a large tract of land, which has been a fortune to all who took care of it, and their children after them. In addition to this, there has not been an office of honor or profit in the gift of the United States, or any individual State, which has not been filled by a Continental officer, if he asked for it. And the Government has given to every officer and soldier who has applied, a pension for life, if he had been wounded or disabled in the public service. Let the two be compared, and see on which side the gratitude preponderates, and then let us be told what the despots of Europe say.

Mr. S. said he knew it had become a little unfashionable to speak of the unconstitutionality of a measure. Precedents seem to be more relied upon than the Constitution for our guide. We are imitating the British Parliament, which Judge Blackstone says is omnipotent. They can do anything. They can regulate the succession to the throne. They can give themselves seats for seven years, when elected only for three years. And they can bestow pensions to any amount, and on whom they please; and they have done so, until the nation is sinking under the burden. And yet we are told by the gentleman from Louisiana (Mr. FROMENTIN) that we possess the same powers. One ground for shaking off that government was to get rid of pensions and placemen, and the power of their Parliament. We are the only nation in the world that has a written Constitution, in which all the powers of the Government are expressed and limited. If we err, this is our only standard to which we can recur for correction. But if you produce twenty precedents not in conformity to the Constitution, they cannot alter it; they will show with what familiarity the Constitution has been violated, yet the Constitution will remain the same, and ought to be again resorted to as the only correct guide. Of what avail is the Constitution, if precedent is to govern? Once establish the precedent, and you have no control over Congress but the discretion of its members; and, like the British Parliament, it will soon become omnipotent. If good feelings, as some gentlemen (Mr. OTIS and Mr. CHITTENDEN) have avowed, are to govern your Congress, they will soon become as omnipotent as the British Parliament, and your Government become bankrupt. One of these gentlemen (Mr. OTIS) avows he is governed by good feelings, and that this measure originated in good feelings. This, sir, is a miserable guide to a legislator. They are as changeable as any other human passion. It is only fit to be indulged in private life, where it is sometimes useful, and always amiable; but even there it has brought many a man to beggary; and if indulged by the Congress of the United States will soon beggar this nation. Your successors will have the same right to provide for their favorite objects; and when is this system to end? Never, as long as the members of Congress have friends to provide for. We know this passion is more predominant in the young and the gay. Why, then, has the Constitution provided that a member of the House of Representatives shall not be eligible to a seat until he is twenty-five years of age, a Senator thirty, and a President must be thirty-five? It was evidently that the nation might have the benefit of matured judgments and sound discretion to govern in your councils; that your measures might be maturely weighed and bottomed on the principles of esteemed justice, as the only correct standard of sound policy to govern in all cases, and in all times, instead of the good feelings the gentlemen speak of, and which are as fleeting as the winds.

Here is one fact not to be controverted: If you can give a pension to one man you can give it to another, without regard to his character; and if the Constitution does not authorize the power, you have nothing to predicate it on but prerogative. There can be but the two sources: one derived from the Constitution, which can be shown, if it exists; the other derived from prerogative, which is unknown to our Government, except in the modern doctrine of precedents, which is its foundation in all governments. The King of Great Britain has his prerogatives to a great extent, which have nothing but precedent for their origin, and are not even sanctioned by an act of Parliament at this day. So in this country, this prerogative has its origin in precedent, and is maintained upon precedent. And there is no reason why it should not, in a short time, become as formidable as the prerogative in England unless it is checked.

As an argument, it would appear, to avoid an inquiry into the propriety of this measure, we are told such a case can never happen again—that you can never have another Revolutionary war. Will not those brave men who fought your battles, and triumphed so gallantly over the enemy at Chippewa, Plattsburg, Erie, Champaign, Orleans, and on the seas, have the same claim upon their country some thirty-five years hence, when time shall have thrown a veil over all the minute circumstances, and it shall be forgotten that they retired from the army with reluctance, after being abundantly paid and abundantly honored?

Their claim will be as great, and the precedent you are about to make will be followed. One army you say gained your independence, and the other has given it a new character, and made it worth maintaining. They have released your country from its degraded state of impressments, paper blockades, royal orders in council, and imperial decrees, and given it as high a grade in the scale of nations as your independence. This will be the beginning of a military pension system that posterity may regret.

All the despotisms of Europe have had their foundations in a claim to military merit. All their pensions and places originated in it. All the orders of knighthood and other distinctions now so oppressive; the feudal system, which so completely prostrated the civil liberty of all Europe, against which the wisdom of ages has not been able to prevail, originated in it. All their usurpations, and all their changes of empire, were commenced and supported by it. It was military fame that enabled Cromwell to turn out of doors a British Parliament, and assume the reins of government. It was military distinction that prompted Bonaparte, at the head of his army, to supersede the French Convention, and put himself upon the imperial throne, and devastate almost the whole of Europe. Your own Revolutionary officers, for some of whom you are now providing, at the close of the war associated themselves into a military order, and called it the Cincinnati Society, after the celebrated Roman General, Cincinnatus, who left his plough with regret, when called by his country to the head of the army; and after he conquered the enemy and returned in triumph, he laid down his office, and retired back to plough his fields at the age of eighty years. This society, too, made an early effort to perpetuate itself, and ordained that the son should succeed to the military honors of his father. However, it was frowned upon; and they soon found it too much of an exotic to flourish upon this soil, and the hereditary clause was abolished. This hereditary quality was not in conformity to their great prototype. He, with true Roman virtue, returned to perform the duties of a citizen, and maintained himself by the sweat of his brow, after he had laid down the pursuits of a soldier. It is difficult to imagine why our American officers and soldiers did not do so too. Many of them did, and are rich from their own industry. No country upon the globe ever presented more facilities than this. But the Roman virtue has lost its charms, and we are imitating nations nearer our own times. It is not the amount which this measure will cost the nation that is the most objectionable, but the abominable perpetual pension system that is to grow out of it. It may not be immediate; it is to come on gradually, as all other systems of oppression have done. And when we are gone to rest posterity will writhe beneath the yoke, borne down by hearth money, excises, and taxes, to support pensions and places—the curse of a nation.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH declared himself opposed to the indefinite postponement, and in favor of the motion of Mr. KING, with some modifications; to give time for which, he wished the postponement of the bill to Monday next, and that it be made the order for that day.

Mr. MORRIL said, he should not, at this late hour, and advanced period of the debate at which he rose, detain the Senate with many remarks on the subject now under discussion.

The object suggested in the President's Message, said he, and that which is also contemplated in the bill from the House, is to afford relief, by pecuniary assistance, to surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution, who are now in indigent circumstances. It is intimated that it is impossible to frame a bill which shall equitably meet the wants, relieve the necessities, and satisfy the expectations of this meritorious class of our fellow-citizens. I do believe, Mr. President, that the wisdom of Congress is competent to form a bill, the details of which shall meet all reasonable expectations on this subject. But as the merits of the bill are not immediately under discussion, I pass them to the motion which is directly before the Senate, that the further consideration of this subject be indefinitely postponed. To this motion, sir, I am opposed, and shall assign some reasons. To pass this resolution, would be, in effect, to put this subject at rest; if I may use the expression, to wink it out of sight. To this, Mr. President, I cannot give my assent. If we take a concise view of our country previous to the declaration of independence, and the trying scenes through which our fathers passed to gain and establish this independence, I presume we shall be fully satisfied, that the few remaining veterans of the Revolution, bowed down with infirmity and age, deserve the interposing hand of the National Government for their relief, for the mitigation of their wants in their declining years.

What, sir, was our situation antecedent to the bold assertion of our independence? We were an oppressed, insulted, degraded people. We were burdened with unjust acts and duties, too offensive, and unreasonable to be endured by a people sensible of their rights and privileges. We were invaded by an armed force. The same Power who we had reason to expect would, as a parent, protect our privileges, entered our harbors, blockaded our ports, landed an army on our shores, demolished and burnt our towns, and fought and killed our citizens. These events roused the spirit, called forth the energy, and marshalled the strength of the nation. This was a time that tried men's souls; this was the day in which the patriot and the hero distinguished himself from the sycophant of a deluded monarch. Independence was declared by a new Government, imperfectly organized. Now, sir, it needed the co-operation of the whole strength, patriotism, and energy, of the nation. The heroes of the country flew to arms; they ran to the field of battle; they met the invading foe, and repelled him with undaunted determination.

And what were the sacrifices of those who fought our battles, and achieved the numerous blessings which we enjoy? Many of us, Mr. President, who have seats in this House, who are participating the favors purchased by their toils, and basking in the beams of national glory, were too young minutely to recollect the distresses of that day. Those who were of age, and were active on that memorable era, have informed us. History has not been silent on a subject so momentous.

Were I to endeavor, sir, to paint to you the sacrifices of those times, I should fail in the attempt. I will only say, they forsook every domestic accommodation; they left their homes and their families, and submitted the cultivation of their farms, in numerous instances to their wives, their little sons, and their daughters, who were under the necessity of laboring in the field to procure subsistence; while they endured the noisome camp, the fatigues of an army, and the dangers of battle. But, sir, their efforts were not unsuccessful; they disputed the ground at the cannon's mouth; they survived the mighty conflict; they obtained the ultimate object—national independence; and some of them now live to enjoy the fruit of their labor, though in indigence and want. These are the characters, Mr. President, whose necessities I wish to relieve. Providence has protracted their years; they are declining under the pressure of poverty and age; they are now petitioning you for assistance. Will you suffer the gray hairs of these veterans of the Revolution to come down with sorrow to the grave? They, sir, have a claim upon your benevolence and humanity—nay, more, your justice. Though some honorable gentlemen suggest that these Revolutionary patriots, having been well paid, have no claim upon the justice of Congress, I am inclined to think otherwise, because I conceive many of the infirmities under which they are now groaning, are in consequence of the privations and exposures endured while in the service of their country. In the camp and the field, their constitutions were broken down; the natural effects of which are, infirmity and distress in advanced years.

Permit me, Mr. President, to ask the honorable members of this Senate, if they are willing to see the warworn soldier of the Revolution hovering round their dwellings, round this Capitol, asking for a pittance, and not manifest a disposition to afford them that pecuniary assistance necessary to supply the cravings of nature, and repair their tattered garments? This is the only tribunal to which they can apply. Shall they seek in vain? Shall those who met the foe at Lexington, Bunker's Hill, Monmouth, and Bennington, supplicate your aid without success? No, sir; we, who possess the blessings procured by their sufferings, have too much magnanimity, too much humanity! They need assistance; they merit assistance. It is to the indigent that I would extend the hand of liberality. And, sir, so long as I have the honor of a seat in this House, I will exert my feeble powers for the mitigation of the necessities of those who, by their valor, toils, and blood, achieved the civil and religious privileges which we now enjoy.

Mr. MACON, of North Carolina, said, when he came to the Senate this morning, he had no intention or expectation of saying a word on this question, which had excited so much feeling. It seemed to him, that the friends of the bill founded their arguments entirely on feeling—a feeling, he was ready to acknowledge, of the most honorable kind; but he was not perfectly satisfied that it was proper to legislate on feeling alone. The Constitution certainly never intended it, or it would not have required a certain age for any appointment; nor did he believe the motion to postpone liable to the objection which had been made; that the friends of the bill were forced to defend it as it was, when they wished to amend it. The motion was agreed by all to be perfectly in order, and it only brought the principle of the bill into debate, which gave both sides the fairest opportunity to urge whatever they thought proper; and this he conceived ought to be the nature of every first discussion, especially when a great and important change was about to be made in the character of a long established law; the principles of which were settled by the Revolutionary Congress, and not attempted, he believed, to be changed before the present session. A debate like the present ought always to take place in every legislature, when motions which only contain first principles are under consideration, and cannot with propriety be omitted.

Mr. M. said he felt more than usual embarrassment in attempting to speak at this time, because there was reason to suppose that a great and decided majority was opposed to him, and it was not agreeable to speak to those who were prepared to vote, but it was all that a minority could do to state their opinions, and because, contrary to the practice of the Senate, two motions, distinct from each other, had been debated at the same time; that of the gentleman from New York (Mr. KING) to recommit the bill to the Military Committee, with instructions so to amend it, as only to include the officers who were in service at the end of the war, and that of the gentleman from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) to postpone the bill and motion to a day beyond the session. He would here say, that the observations of the gentleman from New York, in support of his motion, had not convinced him, that a discrimination such as he desired, or any other, could with justice or propriety be made. To discriminate in a satisfactory manner, at any time, or in any country, between those who were equally worthy, was a task not easily performed; that gentleman having failed to show that it could be done, as he with great deference verily believed, it might now be considered as utterly impossible, and would not, in his opinion, be attempted by any other.

Mr. President, when the character, numbers, and wealth of the British nation, to which may be added its constant preparation for war, are compared with the situation of the United States at the commencement of the Revolution, it must prove to all, that every whig in the country had as much as he could do to maintain the independence which the Congress of 1776 had manfully declared, to the joy of the nation, and which the whigs boldly determined to defend at the risk of their lives and their fortunes. It was the day that tried men's souls. The immortal words "Liberty or Death," on the hunting shirt of every friend of the Revolution, contained nothing but the truth. The practice was according to the motto; but now, no matter what services may have been rendered, unless the persons who rendered them were in the regular army, they are not to receive a cent under the bill, though they may have paid many. The bill does not provide for one half who have equal merit; as to claim, there is none; and the motion of the gentleman from New York will leave a much greater number not provided for. No man can estimate higher than I do the worth and service of the Continental troops, but the fall of Charleston left none in the Southern States, and it is certainly true, that after that event the men commanded by Sumter, Marion, and Jackson, rendered as much service as any in the nation; in fact they had no superiors; they left their wives, their children, their homes and their all, to the rage of a victorious enemy, who was in pursuit of those he declared rebels, and enraged neighbors, in the most gloomy and disastrous period of the great struggle, to fight for their country, its liberty and independence. Nor is there any provision for that man, with his small band of warriors, who started with their parched corn on their backs, into the country, or rather wilderness, mostly inhabited by savages, and gained by their victories a country to the nation, out of which five large States will be added to the Union; indeed two are already added, and a third soon will be. It is scarcely necessary to state that General George R. Clark and his warriors are meant. Can justice, honor, generosity, or feeling, require that all these, together with the widows and children of those who were slain in battle, as well as the deranged officers mentioned by the gentleman from New York, should be taxed to support their fellow patriots, who were at that time, as far as respects the officers, in a more enviable situation? It is well known, that the deranged officers constantly complained of their being deranged, and that they preferred to have been continued in the service; many of them, not willing to stay at home, obtained commands in the militia, and in that way served the country. Nor ought it to be forgotten, that tents and all camp utensils were never plenty, and often scarce, and that the regulars were always first supplied with whatever could be furnished, and that too with the best there was; whatever was left, after furnishing the regulars, was divided among the militia, who were frequently without tents or camp utensils, unless they carried them from their homes, and in many parts of the Southern States these necessary articles were not abundant. In wet and stormy days it was not uncommon to see tents formed by two or three or more men putting together not their blankets, for but very few had them, but bed covers, which had been spun and wove at home; those who were not fortunate enough to carry anything of this kind, stood by trees with bark or whatever they could get to cover their heads to keep the rain off. The character the war then assumed, forbade any article necessary or convenient to the soldier to be in plenty; there was nothing like it in any other part of the nation, if in the world. In calamity and fury it so far surpassed a common civil war, that the name is improper for it. He knew not by what name to call it, perhaps a domestic war would come nearer to it than any other. In the parts of the country where the Whigs and Tories were mixed, it was neighbor against neighbor, house against house, and neighborhood against neighborhood; destruction and death were the orders of the day; each party hunted the other, either alone or in numbers, as circumstances would permit—neither trouble nor pains were spared to destroy and kill. In many places, houses, fences, and everything necessary to support life, were burnt, leaving the women and children only with the clothes they had on, to depend on a more fortunate neighbor for sustenance and shelter. In some cases this was done, when the husband or son, or perhaps both, were confined in jail, because they were whigs; many plantations were left without stock of any kind, not a horse nor cow, in this forlorn condition to be cultivated by the women and children, who, if they were fortunate enough to gather a part of the corn they had labored to produce, were compelled to beat it in a mortar into meal, or carry it themselves to a mill to be ground, if one was left in the neighborhood. Places may yet be seen where houses were burnt, which yet remain not built on. The rich and the poor who survived, and who would not agree on any terms to remain neutral at home, when parts of the country were overrun by the enemy, shared nearly the same fate, left with nothing but life and liberty.

Many gallant actions were performed in this neighborhood war, which history will never record, and many gallant and patriotic men fell, whose names will in a little time be forgotten in this their beloved country, for which they freely shed their blood and lost their lives. Mebane and Kulp are of the number who were slain in these terrible conflicts, and are now almost forgotten. These engagements were generally fatal and sanguinary in proportion to the few that fought. With permission he would repeat that it could not be just or right to tax these people to give a pension to any, because they were in the regular army; it seemed like taxing the bones of the brave and the ashes of distress; the officers of the army, at the end of the war, received five years' full pay, and both officers and soldiers land from the United States; besides, every State which had back land unsettled, gave land to the same officers and soldiers, which were raised in the State. But it is said that the Continental troops were paid in depreciated certificates, not worth more than one-eighth of their value. This is undoubtedly true; yet they were considered to be more valuable than the State certificates, in which the others were paid. Certificates were then the only currency of the governments; they made all their payments in them. After the fall of the paper money, provisions for the army were frequently taken from families which could not well spare them. Whenever necessity compelled this, Whig and Tory fared alike; but a certificate was the only payment. The depreciation was a national calamity, from which no one was exempt; it was as general as the liberty we now enjoy, and, though equally free, we are not now equally rich.

We have been frequently told that some of the officers and soldiers of the Continental army are poor. This no doubt was true. He also believed it was equally true that some of the troops which he had mentioned were equally so. This will be the case among every class of men; some will get rich, while others do not; there is a time to get and a time to spend; the industrious and careful will either get rich or comfortable, while those who are not so, will neither be rich nor comfortable. To undertake to provide for those who will not provide for themselves, will, on experiment, be found an endless task; it may suit other countries, but it does not this; it will drain any treasury, no matter how full, and, instead of repealing taxes, new ones ought to be imposed. Pass the bill, and the pension will not do those who do not provide for themselves as much good as it will others, who know their failings, and will take care to be with them when it shall be received. The gentleman from Maryland (Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH) wishes the bill to pass, to do away an opinion which had been entertained, that Republics were ungrateful; he did not state it to be his opinion. It was a pleasing fact that the history of the United States did, in the most satisfactory manner, prove that it was not true, as it regarded them, nor did he believe it, as it regarded others. It has been promulgated by the flatterers and sycophants of kings and despots, to become their favorites and pensioners, to live sumptuously on their folly or wickedness, or both, on the profits of the labor of those who were more virtuous and better than themselves. The opinion is founded in idleness and hatred to free Governments, where every man ought to live by the sweat of his own brow—where no man ought to be paid to do nothing. But, do as you will, the same class of people will entertain and promulgate the same opinion; and he was unwilling to attempt to do away the opinion by passing that which he conceived to be an improper and unjust act. He would add, that, in despotic Governments, to complain would be deemed a crime, and that the only liberty enjoyed was that of abusing Republics.

It has been said that the officers of the Revolutionary army would have been severely punished if the United States had been conquered. This, he believed, was not thought of at the time, because no Whig ever calculated on being conquered, and every one had determined not to be. But whether they would have been punished more severely than others, he did not know; all had committed openly what, in that case, would have been deemed treason. He, however, was of opinion that the most severe punishment would not have been inflicted on the army. The history of the times warranted the opinion. He rather thought it would have been inflicted on those daring patriots who were members of the first Congress, those who declared independence with the halter about their necks, and those who ordered an army to be raised. These are the men, he thought, on whom vengeance would have been taken. Permit me here, said Mr. M., to state what was certainly true, and that too in praise of a class of men who rarely received praise—that no class of men in the nation had more merit for the Revolution than the lawyers. Where he was acquainted, they were all Whigs; he did not at this moment recollect a single exception. They understood better than most others the rights and privileges of the then colonies, and exerted themselves, with advantage to the country and honor to themselves, to persuade others to examine and understand them; they succeeded, and we now enjoy the benefit. He hoped this digression would be pardoned; he had only given the well-merited praise. He would return to the subject. If the pensions are to be given, because the army deserved well of the country, and some of them are now poor, would it not follow that all who deserved well, and are now poor, ought to receive a pension? Would it not follow that if any members of the Congress he had mentioned, were now alive and poor, that they too, for the same cause, ought to have a pension? It would, he thought, be difficult to give a reason for one, which would not apply as forcibly to the other. The deserving well and being poor, would apply equally to both. He repeated that he wished it to be distinctly understood that he was not denying the worth or merit of the Revolutionary army. God forbid that he should; he never for a moment entertained a single sentiment that even tended toward its dishonor; but he was opposing the principles of the bill, and the motion to recommit, both of which he fully believed were against the principles which carried it into the field. Nor did he mean to class them with the seventeen hundred applicants for office in the late war, which had been mentioned. He, however, felt no hesitation to acknowledge that he approved their conduct; they did what at all times they ought to do—show a willingness to aid their country in defence of its just rights, and to take part in a war which had been emphatically called a second war for independence. Pass the bill, and it makes a precedent for the army engaged in that war and in every other. Precedent is now almost equal to the Constitution, and will probably, in a few years, be quite so. It does not require the gift of prophecy to foretell that thirty or forty years hence, as much may be said in favor of the army engaged in the second war for independence, as we have now heard about the first, though as much may not be said about the state of the country and of the sufferings of the people, because the facts will not warrant it. The troops, however, in the late war, in the uninhabited parts of the country, suffered greatly, and bore their sufferings manfully. The victories obtained by them have not been surpassed in any age or any country; they were fully equal to those of Lexington and King's Mountain; but the men who fought these two glorious battles are not provided for in the bill, because they were militia.

It is not improper to observe, that pensions in all countries begin on a small scale, and are at first generally granted on proper considerations, and that they increase till at last they are granted as often on whim or caprice as for proper considerations. The bill is an entire departure from any principle heretofore established in this country; it requires little or no proof to get the pension, and it gives to all alike, without regard to disability or meritorious services. The history of the half-pay for life, and the commutation for it of five years' full pay, show as clear as daylight the opinion then entertained by the nation on the subject of pensions, and the bill as clearly shows how much that opinion has changed since, and that the opinion in favor of pensions is fast gaining ground. It seemed to him that it must operate on the mind like sweet poison does on the taste; it pleases at first, but kills at last. The objects to whom they are granted are only thought of at the time, without reflecting that a part of the money to pay them is to be taken from those who are not in a situation to spare it conveniently; the few rich are not apt to complain of taxes, especially if they believe they are intended to promote what they deem the glory and splendor of the country; they take a full share of that to themselves, and they can live well and pay the tax; but it is not so with the poor; every cent taken from him diminishes his comfort and lessens his independence. It is quite probable that some of the poor, who may contribute their mite to pay the pensions given by the bill, may have been reduced to poverty, by the enemy's burning and destroying their property, for fighting on the same side, and probably in the same battles with those who are to receive them. He would just remark, that he did not think this a proper place to speak of our charity at home. Charity is commendable in all men, it is enjoined on all men, but it ought to be so given as not to let one hand know what the other does. Beside, our private worth, whether for charity or any other virtue, is best known to our neighbors, who always duly appreciate it. He had heard so much said of the feelings of gentlemen on this interesting and important question, that he was almost induced to doubt whether he had as fine feelings as others. He, however, hoped he had, but others must judge, not himself; but, whether he had or not, he could not consent to gratify them at the expense of his judgment.

The old Congress is often praised and always deservedly; on the present occasion it would seem proper that their decision should have great weight, as they conducted the Revolution, raised the Army, and settled with it, and gave to each individual whatever was his due, under all the circumstances of his case. It may not be improper to state that that Congress only paid the Continental troops; the militia and State troops were paid by the States to which they belonged, and the States granted and paid them pensions till within a few years past, when the General Government assumed the pension list of each State, placing all the pensions granted for Revolutionary services on the same ground; and this policy, if the bill is to pass, ought now to be followed—that is, to place all having equal merit on the same ground.

The recommendation of this subject to the consideration of Congress by the President, who was a Revolutionary character, had been mentioned. This recommendation, like every other from the Executive, he felt it his duty to examine with deliberation, and treat with respect; he had, however, to regret that he could not agree to pass an act in conformity to it; the reasons for this he had endeavored to state; his regret, however, would be much greater, if all the preceding Presidents had not also have been Revolutionary characters; and he did not recollect at this time that any one of them had made a similar recommendation, though he had not examined their Messages to ascertain the fact, he spoke only from a momentary recollection of a memory not now very good; if the fact was, as he believed, no one could doubt but that one of them, General WASHINGTON, was as much attached to the Army as any man in the nation. He had thought proper to say this much to enable all to decide whether the national opinion was tending towards pensions or not.

As much had been said about our rich Treasury, and but few to provide for, he thought proper to state that neither of these facts had any weight with him; if justice required that the bill should pass, neither the condition of the Treasury nor the number to be provided for ought to be taken into consideration. As to the Treasury being rich, it had been more so some years past, but was emptied without the aid of such a bill as this.

He hoped the gentleman from New York would pardon him for saying, that, whether the national opinion was changing or not, he thought the vote on this motion, and that for passing the bill, would prove that the gentleman and himself were both a little out of fashion. He, however, believed that they would bear it as it became them, without grieving or complaining; each generation would govern itself, and they had had their day.

On the exertions of the Whigs in the Southern States, after the fall of Charleston and the sufferings of the people, he could, he was sure, speak a month, and not exhaust the subject. He had, however tired himself, and, he feared, fatigued, the Senate. He would, therefore, take his seat.

Mr. OTIS advocated the bill, and opposed the indefinite postponement; and, when he concluded, the Senate adjourned.

FRIDAY, January 30.

On motion by Mr. SANFORD, the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, communicated the 22d instant, and prepared in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 11th December, 1817, relative to the expediency of further legislative provisions to expedite the settlement of public accounts, was referred to the Committee on Finance.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 2d instant, that the instructions from the Legislature of the State of Tennessee to their Senators, this day offered, be received and read. Whereupon, Mr. CAMPBELL submitted the following motion:

Resolved, That the amendment to the Constitution of the United States, proposed by the Legislature of the State of Tennessee, and the instructions to the Senators and Representatives of that State, accompanying the same, be received and entered on the Journals.

Considerable debate took place on this motion. The objection to the proposition was, that the wishes of the State of Tennessee were not addressed to the Senate; and that the Senate had no concern with the instructions of any State to particular members of that body. In reply to which argument, it was said that the object of proposing an amendment to the Constitution was to bring it to the attention of Congress, and that it could not be presented to Congress as the act of that State in any other manner than that now proposed.

The question was finally decided in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Campbell, Crittenden, Dickerson, Eppes, Fromentin, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Talbot, Taylor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Burrill, Daggett, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, King, Morril, Tait, Tichenor, Troup, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

So it was determined that the following resolutions be received and entered:

"Resolved, By the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, That the following amendment be proposed to the Constitution of the United States, to wit:

"That no law, varying the compensation of the members of the Congress of the United States, shall take effect, until the time for which the members of the House of Representatives of that Congress by which the law was passed shall have expired.

"Resolved, That our Senators be instructed, and our Representatives requested, to use their exertions to procure the passage of the foregoing amendment.

"Resolved, That the Governor of this State be requested to transmit copies of the foregoing resolutions to each of our Senators and Representatives in Congress, and that he also transmit to the Executives of the several States like copies, with a request to lay the same before the Legislatures thereof, soliciting their exertions and co-operation in procuring the said amendment to be adopted and made a part of the Constitution of the United States."

FRIDAY, February 6.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petition of Joshua Swain, and others, inhabitants of the county of Cape May, in the State of New Jersey, made report, together with the following resolution:

"That it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petition."

The report and resolution were read.

be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the reservation of such tracts of land within the several land districts of the United States as may, in the opinion of the President, be suitable sites for the laying out and establishing towns, and for the sales of the lots therein.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elijah Rice; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution relative to the distribution of the late edition of the Land Laws; and, the resolution having been amended, the President reported it to the House accordingly; and, the amendments being concurred in, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

Mr. ORIS presented the memorial of Thomas B. Wait and Sons, praying that Congress would purchase an additional number of their edition of the State Papers, and authorize a subscription for the succeeding volumes of said work; also asking permission to print any confidential documents not heretofore published, and which may now appear without detriment to the public interest; and that said work may be revised and corrected under the authority of the Secretary of State; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Joint Library Committee.

Mr. MORROW submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the committee appointed on the memorial of the State of Tennessee respecting claims to lands in that State, be instructed to inquire into the propriety of making a reservation of land for the establishment of a military depot, armory, and foundry, on the waters of Shoal creek, in the State of Tennessee.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, presented the petition of Frederick C. Warnack, agent for the heirs of his uncle, Frederick C. Warnack, deceased, who served as a lieutenant colonel of a corps of engineers in the Virginia line, during the Revolutionary war, and in consideration of his services was entitled, under the laws of the State of Virginia, to six thousand acres of land, which his heirs, being aliens, cannot inherit, and praying relief from Congress; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary in the laws relative to the promulgation of the acts of Congress.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their disagreement to the first amendment, insisted on by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States, for the year 1818." They ask a conference thereon, and have appointed managers on their part.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Senate agreed to the conference proposed on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, on the amendment to the bill last mentioned; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, and BARBOUR, were appointed the managers on the part of the Senate.

MONDAY, February 9.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of Martin Warner; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of Richard Frisby, praying compensation for property destroyed by the enemy during the late war with Great Britain, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the committee to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill respecting the transportation of persons of color for sale, or to be held for labor; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of certain officers of the Navy and of the marine corps attached to the Mediterranean squadron; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, relative to the allowance of a certain salary to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until Thursday next.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing for enforcing the attendance of witnesses before courts martial; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Elijah Rice; and on motion by Mr. DAGGETT, the further consideration thereof was postponed until this day two weeks.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the petition of Joshua Swain, and others, inhabitants of the county of Cape May, in the State of New Jersey; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved, that it is inexpedient to grant the prayer of the petition.

Mr. FROMENTIN called up the petition presented at the last session, of sundry inhabitants of the province of Texas, praying a grant of land in the State of Louisiana, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate resumed the motion of the 27th of last month, relative to moneys paid by the State of Massachusetts for the supplies and services of the militia of that State; and on motion by Mr.

OTIS, the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 6th instant, for instructing the Committee on the Judiciary to inquire whether any, and, if any, what amendments are necessary in the laws relative to the promulgation of the acts of Congress; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 6th instant, for instructing a committee to inquire into the propriety of making a reservation of land for the establishment of a military depot, armory, and foundry, on the waters of Shoal creek, in the State of Tennessee; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 6th instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the reservation of such tracts of land as may, in the opinion of the President, be suitable for the laying out and establishing towns; and agreed thereto.

Agreeably to the special order of the day the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives in Congress, and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee; and on motion by Mr. DICKERSON, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson;" and the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The resolution relative to the distribution of the late edition of the Land Laws, was read a third time, and passed.

TUESDAY, February 10.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, stating that the measures which have been authorized by the Board subsequent to their report of the 7th of February, 1817, so far as the same have been completed, are fully detailed in the report of the Secretary of the Treasury to this Board, dated the 6th day of the present month, and the statements therein referred to, which are herewith transmitted, and prayed to be received as part of this report; and the report was read.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Arthur St. Clair," in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read twice by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to authorize certain purchasers of public lands to withdraw their entries and transfer the moneys paid thereon; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. RUGGLES submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, to compel a more prompt settlement of the accounts of the paymasters and quartermasters of the late army.

Mr. BARROUR asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the act heretofore made for that purpose; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MORROW presented the memorial of John B. Colvin, respecting the future publications of the laws of the United States, proposing to continue the same; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of certain officers of the Navy and Marine Corps, attached to the Mediterranean squadron; and, on motion by Mr. TROUP, the consideration thereof was further postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Military Affairs, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for enforcing the attendance of witnesses before courts martial; and, on motion by Mr. ASHMUN, the report, together with the original resolution of the Senate, was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for enforcing the attendance of witnesses before Naval courts martial.

The Senate resumed the motion of the 27th ultimo, relative to moneys paid by the State of Massachusetts for the supplies and services of the militia of that State; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until to-morrow.

The bill respecting the transportation of persons of color for sale, or to be held to labor, was read the second time.

The bill for the relief of Martin Warner was read the second time.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of James Brobson, marshal of the district of Delaware, praying for some additional compensation to be made to him, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, to whom was referred the resolution providing for the distribution of the 6th volume of the Laws of the United States among the members of the present Congress, reported the same without amendment.

Agreeably to the special order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives to Congress, and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson;" and, on motion by Mr. RUGGLES, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday the 23d instant.

Mr. DAGGETT presented the memorial of the Milford Marble Company, in the State of Connecticut, praying the imposition of a duty on the importation of foreign wrought marble, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read.

Mr. LACOCK presented the memorial of the Philadelphia Society for the promotion of American manufactures, praying the adoption of such measures as may protect and encourage the same; and the memorial was read.

WEDNESDAY, February 11.

Mr. MORRIL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Israel Smith," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. MORRIL, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill for the relief of Richard M. Johnson, reported it with amendments; which were read.

On motion by Mr. MORRIL, the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Hugh May, together with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury thereon, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and they were referred to the Secretary of War.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the bill to alter and amend an act, approved the 3d day of March, 1817, entitled "An act to establish a separate Territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory," reported the same with amendments; which were read.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 13th of February, 1817, I now transmit copies of the reports in relation to the surveys and examinations made, by Naval officers, in co-operation with officers of the Corps of Engineers.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 6, 1818.

The Message and report therein mentioned were read.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Arthur St. Clair," reported the same without amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 10th instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, to compel a more prompt settlement of the accounts of the paymasters and quartermasters of the late army; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of James Brobson, marshal of the district of Delaware; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until next Wednesday.

The bill supplementary to an act, entitled "An act further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes;" was read the second time.

The bill to authorize certain purchasers of public lands to withdraw their entries, and transfer the moneys paid thereon, was read the second time.

The bill to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the acts heretofore made for that purpose, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, and Messrs. BARBOUR, DAGGETT, and KING, were appointed the Committee.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

As the house appropriated for the President of the United States, will be finished this year, it is thought to merit the attention of Congress, in what manner it should be furnished, and what measures ought to be adopted for the safe-keeping of the furniture in future. All the public furniture provided before 1814, having been destroyed with the public building in that year, and little afterwards procured, owing to the inadequacy of the appropriation, it has become necessary to provide almost every article, requisite for such an establishment; whence, the sum to be expended will be much greater than at any former period. The furniture, in its kind and extent, is thought to be an object not less deserving attention, than the building for which it is intended. Both being national objects, each seems to have equal claim to Legislative sanction. The disbursement of the public money, too, ought, it is presumed, to be in like manner provided for by law. The person who may happen to be placed, by the suffrage of his fellow-citizens, in this high trust, having no personal interest in these concerns, should be exempted from undue responsibility respecting them.

For a building so extensive, intended for a purpose exclusively national, in which, in the furniture provided for it, a mingled regard is due to the simplicity and purity of our institutions, and to the character of the people who are represented in it, the sum already appropriated, has proved altogether inadequate. The present is therefore a proper time for Congress to take the subject into consideration, with a view to all the objects claiming attention, and to regulate it by law. On a knowledge of the furniture procured, and the sum expended for it, a just estimate may be formed, regarding the extent of the building, of what will still be wanting to furnish the house. Many of the articles being of a durable nature, may be handed down through a long series of service; and being of great value, such as plate, ought not to be left altogether, and at all times, to the care of servants alone. It seems to be advisable that a public agent should be charged with it, during the occasional absences of the President, and have authority to transfer it from one President to another, and likewise to make reports of occasional deficiencies, as the basis on which further provision should be made.

It may also merit consideration, whether it may not be proper to commit the care of the public buildings, particularly the President's house and the Capitol, with the grounds belonging to them, including, likewise, the furniture of the latter, in a more especial manner, to a public agent. Hitherto, the charge of this valuable property seems to have been connected with the structure of the buildings, and committed to those employed in it. This guard will necessarily cease when the buildings are finished, at which time, the interest in them will be proportionally augmented. It is presumed that this trust is, in a certain degree, at least, incidental to the other duties of the Superintendent of the Public Buildings; but it may merit consideration, whether it will not be proper to charge him with it more explicitly, and to give him authority to employ one or more persons under him for these purposes.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 10, 1818.

The Message was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 27th of last month, for instructing the Committee of Claims to inquire into the expediency of providing for the examination and allowance of moneys paid by the State of Massachusetts, for the supplies and services of the militia of that State, employed during the late war in the common defence, so far as the same may be due upon principles of equity and justice; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting the transportation of persons of color for sale, or to be held to labor; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Friday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Martin Warner; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution providing for the distribution of the 6th volume of the Laws of the United States among the members of the present Congress, who have not been furnished therewith; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Agreeably to the special order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives in Congress, and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, together with the amendment reported thereto by the select committee.

Mr. DICKERSON addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, the Legislature of the State of New Jersey, which I have the honor, in part, to represent, have instructed their Senators, and have requested the Representatives of the State, to use their endeavors to obtain the amendment to the Constitution of the United States now proposed. As I acknowledge their right so to instruct, I am disposed to yield a cheerful and ready obedience to their will. It becomes my duty, therefore, to contribute my humble efforts in support of the resolution now on your table. This resolution is substantially the same as that received from the Legislature of New Jersey, and that subsequently received from the Legislature of North Carolina, but differing from both in phraseology. The committee, to whom this subject was referred, have endeavored to improve the language of those resolutions. It has been their aim to make it concise, simple, explicit, and technical. They considered these circumstances as of considerable importance, as, in a Constitutional provision, every sentence and every word should be duly weighed and adjusted.

The amendment now proposed, if adopted, will neither increase nor diminish the relative strength of the two great parties which now divide, and which, in all probability, under their present, or some other denominations, will continue to divide the United States. Yet, in different sections of the country, very considerable alterations will take place, the respective parties gaining in some States and losing in others. And, as these alterations will diminish the strength and influence of the majorities in the respective States, the proposed amendment may be expected to meet with much opposition, but such as I hope will yield to the paramount consideration of the general good. An amendment like this, calculated to oppose the prejudices, to interfere with the private views and private interests, and to restrain the ambition of those by whose votes it must be carried, if carried at all, will necessarily be attended with difficulties, at all times great, and absolutely insuperable in times of party violence. Nothing but the great importance and, indeed, pressing necessity of the measure, can insure its success, even under the most favorable circumstances.

The present moment is peculiarly auspicious for making this attempt, as there is now less of party animosity than there has been at any period whatever since the establishment of our present form of Government. The experience we have already had forbids the hope that the present state of political harmony can be permanent, or of long continuance. If the present favorable opportunity be suffered to pass by, unimproved, it may never again occur.

The efforts which have been made in several of the States, to obtain an alteration in the Constitution similar to the one now proposed, is a sufficient indication of the public sentiment, and would, independently of other considerations, induce us to give the subject a most serious and laborious investigation. The Legislatures of Massachusetts, New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and North Carolina, have, at different periods, discovered a disposition to adopt a system of districting the States, for the purpose of choosing Electors, and a great proportion of the smaller States have manifested the same disposition. Under these circumstances, those who believe that the permanency of our present form of Government in no small degree depends upon the success of this measure, would be inexcusable if they should now relax from their exertions.

In all the discussions respecting this amendment, the provision for the choice of Electors seems to have been the primary object, and in that point of light I have always viewed it.

The most important, the most delicate, and, beyond comparison, the most hazardous operation under our Constitution is the election of a President of the United States. And the difficulties and dangers of this operation increase with the increasing population of our country. To choose a Chief Magistrate for eight millions of people, jealous of their rights, and impatient of control, cannot be effected under the best system of election, without some degree of hazard; but, if we extend our views to a period, not very remote, when our population shall amount to twenty or thirty millions of people, spread over an immense extent of territory, can we suppress our fears, that our present disjointed, discordant, and jarring system, will be found altogether inadequate to the purposes of a fair election? and, of consequence, inadequate to the purposes of preserving the peace and quiet of our country.

I will venture to predict that, whenever a dissolution of our present form of Government shall take place, it will be in consequence of a failure to come at a just expression of the public will in the choice of a President. And when, unhappily, this Government shall be dissolved, and the United States divided into parts by violence, those parts will not be free Republics, but will, of necessity, become military despotisms.

It will be allowed that, in an operation so all-important as that of an election of a President, every process should be regulated with the utmost exactness and precision; and, yet, there is scarcely an officer, great or small, important or unimportant, in the State government, or in the United States Governments, who is elected or appointed by a rule so undefined, so vague, so variable, so subject to abuse, as that by which we elect the Chief Magistrate of the Union.

It has often been asserted, and, I believe, never denied, that every decisive step in the election of a President should be perfectly uniform, as well as simultaneous, throughout the United States; and, yet, if we take a view of the Presidential elections for the twenty years last past, it would seem as if uniformity had been carefully avoided. The States not only differ from each other, but differ from themselves. If the discordant systems adopted by the different States were to be permanent, it would afford some security for fair elections. But, so far from this, they are the subjects of constant fluctuation and change—of frequent, hasty, and rash, experiment—established, altered, abolished, re-established, according to the dictates of the interest, the ambition, the whim, or caprice, of party and faction.

Very early under the present Constitution, some of the smaller States adopted the plan of choosing Electors by a general ticket. In this there seemed to be no great inconvenience, as the people at large would generally know the characters of the small number of candidates to be elected; but, as it entirely suppressed the voice of the minorities of the States in which it was adopted, and as it gave to those States an undue weight in the general scale, the procedure was looked upon with a jealous eye by the larger States, some of which have adopted the same plan, not that they have thought it right, but, in order to form a counterpoise to the improper weight of the States previously adopting the rule, and they have justified themselves for adopting a measure they condemn, upon the plea of retaliation and necessity. The measure of voting by a general ticket, in the large States, where the voters can know nothing of the characters of four-fifths of the candidates for whom they vote, is fraught with so much difficulty, uncertainty, and absurdity; is such a total dereliction of every principle of republicanism that some of the States have thought the practice inadmissible, and have adhered to the equitable mode of choosing Electors in single districts; but have had the mortification to see, that, in adhering to correct principles, they have lost a portion of their relative strength; and that, in fact, they have suffered for the exercise of their political integrity.

The Legislatures of some of the States have boldly taken into their own hands, or, perhaps I do not use too strong language when I say they have usurped the power of appointing Electors. This appears to me a dangerous mode, inasmuch as it is in my mind a departure from the spirit if not from the letter of the Constitution.

By the first section, second article of the Constitution, "Each State shall appoint, as the Legislature thereof shall direct, a number of Electors," &c. Under the letter of this section, the Legislatures may direct a vote for Electors by a general ticket, or may divide the States into equal or unequal districts, at their pleasure; but, it appears to me an inadmissible construction of the language of this section, that the Legislature shall direct how they themselves shall appoint. If, therefore, the practice which has hitherto prevailed in several of the States, in this particular, is in any degree an infringement of the Constitution, or if there is a well-founded doubt upon this subject, which I think will hardly be denied, then it is highly expedient that the Constitutional remedy of amendment should be applied, and that this procedure should be corrected.

In some of the large States, where a resort to a general ticket for the choice of Electors has been deemed inadmissible on account of its uncertainty and absurdity, and where it has not been deemed correct under the Constitution to appoint Electors by a vote of the Legislature, the majority, not willing to adopt the fair mode of single districts, as that would give to the minority its due weight, have resorted to a mode of forming irregular districts, some large and some small, without regard to the situation or extent of the territory forming the districts. In this the aim has been to secure to the dominant party an undue influence, by suppressing, as far as practicable, the voice of the minority. This system of defeating every purpose of a fair election, has become an art and a science; and is known by the technical term of gerrymandering.

This irregular mode of forming districts has admitted of gross abuses, and has brought the greatest reproach upon the States in which it has prevailed. The sinister and ambitious motives of those who have adopted it, are left exposed to the public eye in all their deformity, without the slightest veil or covering. They are calculated to have a pernicious effect upon public manners. They have a tendency to unhinge every principle of moral as well as political rectitude in the minds of the people, and they destroy the respect which we ought to feel for our republican institutions. But, they may have one good effect in showing, in the strongest point of view, the necessity of adopting some uniform and equitable mode of districting the States.

The Legislatures of some of the States, under the vague and uncertain provisions of our Constitution, have resorted to means of a still more dangerous character.

In the State of Pennsylvania, the two Houses of Legislature are elected for different periods; the Senate for four years—members of Assembly for one year; in consequence of which it may frequently happen that the Houses will be of different political sentiments. This did happen in the year 1801, when the United States were agitated with a Presidential election then pending. Thirteen of the twenty-five Senators were of the party then called Federalists, giving to them a majority of one. A very large majority of the opposite character were in the other House, who, having been then recently elected, afforded a very fair representation of the relative strength of the parties throughout the State. The vote of Pennsylvania was considered as decisive of the election. In consequence of the disagreement of the two Houses in the Legislature of the preceding year, no law had been made for choosing Electors. As the time approached for choosing Electors, the Governor convened the Legislature to provide for the case. The majority of the Senate knew that if they went into a joint meeting with the members of Assembly, they would be outnumbered, and determined that the Electors should be chosen by a concurrent, and not by a joint vote of the two Houses. This was in fact determining that there should be no appointment of Electors; inasmuch as the Houses would never agree as to the candidates, and this was the intention. The thirteen Senators who took this bold and decided stand, conceived it so much an act of political heroism, that they dubbed themselves the Spartan band. And they persisted in this measure, in defiance of public opinion, until the members of the Senate were induced to enter into a disgraceful compromise, by which one-half of the Electors were to be of one party, the other half of the other, except the odd one, who was given to the House of Representatives. So that a vast majority of the powerful State of Pennsylvania was, in fact, represented by a single Elector. In that election the smallest State in the Union had more weight.

In the year 1808, the majority of each branch of the Legislature of Massachusetts were opposed to the Governor of the State, whose assent is necessary to legislative acts. The two Houses appointed Electors without the assent of the Governor to the act or resolution under which they were appointed. As the votes of Massachusetts could not affect the Presidential election, I believe they were not disputed; but, had they been disputed, they would probably have been rejected; at least, Massachusetts, from the imperfection of our system, ran the hazard of losing her vote. In the instance of Pennsylvania, the voice of the majority was suppressed; this was an evil hardly to be submitted to; but, in New Jersey, a much bolder step has been taken; the voice of the majority has been more than suppressed, to use a solecism, for they have been made to speak a language exactly the reverse of their wishes. In the year 1812, by a strange concurrence of circumstances, not necessary to be here detailed, a small majority of the Legislature were in direct opposition to a very large majority of the citizens of the State. By a law, which had been many years in existence, the Electors, as well as Representatives in Congress, were to be elected by the people in a general ticket; the election was to take place early in November. The Legislature met late in October, and only eight days previously to the day of election; under the provisions of the law, nominations had been made for Electors and Representatives in Congress in all the counties of the State. Copies of these nominations had been transmitted to the Executive of the State, from which a general nomination was made out, and transmitted by the Executive to all the county clerks, who had transmitted copies of the same to all the town clerks, by whom they had been duly advertised; all this had been done at considerable expense and trouble previously to the meeting of the Legislature. It will scarcely be believed that any Legislature would, under such circumstances, venture to arrest the progress of an election so far advanced and so near a completion. The Legislature, however, repealed the election law, and took into their own hands the appointment of Electors. Expresses were sent into the different parts of the State, to give notice of this repeal, but not in time, for the citizens in many towns met and gave their votes for Electors and Representatives without knowing of the repeal of the law. The Legislature appointed eight Electors, not one of whom would have been appointed by the people under the late election law; and this the Legislature well knew, otherwise they would not have taken from the people the right of choosing Electors under the law. By this rash measure, which the people took care to reprobate at the next election, the majority in the State not only lost their vote, but were made to speak a language, as I before observed, exactly the reverse of their wishes.

As we have never experienced any serious mischief from this kind of violence on the part of the State Legislatures, it may be thought that no great danger is to be apprehended. But, we should reflect, that those daring attempts to defeat the public will have not been successful. The result of the election of 1801 was the same as it would have been if Pennsylvania had given its full vote; whether the vote of Massachusetts was received or not, in 1809, it did not affect that election; but here I must observe, that the vote of that State was by no means of the character of that of Pennsylvania, or that subsequently of New Jersey. The vote of New Jersey had no effect upon the election of 1813. But, suppose the kind of violence which took place in Pennsylvania, should be resorted to on a more extensive scale, and that the voice of New York, Pennsylvania, and Virginia should be suppressed by the collision of their Legislatures, and that, by these means, a man, not the choice of the people, should be imposed upon us as President of the United States: what would be the consequence? I will not say civil war; but I do not go too far when I say, the peace of the country would be in great danger. It is true, we have not yet suffered from these measures; but are we never to profit by any experience in which we are not sufferers? Possibly, the first time we suffer from this kind of violence will be that in which the Union will be dissolved.

Under the present system, while the Legislatures take into their hands the appointment of Electors, and can calculate their exact weight in a Presidential election, a boundless field is opened for the intrigues of ambitious men and ambitious States. Combinations may, and no doubt will, be formed, by which the minority in the Union will control the majority, than which, nothing can more certainly tend to the destruction of our Government. Calculations upon this subject have been often made and often repeated. I will submit one for the consideration of the Senate; the whole number of Electors in the twenty States is two hundred and twenty-four, of these one hundred and twelve make a majority, and can elect a President. The States of New York,

New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Maryland, Virginia, and North Carolina, are composed of contiguous territory, and, from their central situation, may be supposed to have an interest in common with each other, and motives of combination not to be found in other States. These six States, one of them a small State, and another but of middle size, have one hundred and thirteen Electors, a majority of the whole; a bare majority in the Legislatures of each of these States can give a President to the United States, even if the other fourteen States were unanimously opposed to him. This is an extreme case, but serves to elucidate the subject, and cannot fail to have an impression, that this kind of abuse may and will be carried to a dangerous extreme, unless some Constitutional check be interposed. Thus, it is evident, that a combination, contemptible for its numbers, may place a President in the Chair of State; but can they support him there? This should be the test. No power should elect a President that could not support him when elected. When the physical strength of the country elect a President, then all is safe; for the power that has created can defend. By the physical strength of the country I mean, not Prætorian bands or standing armies, but the majority of the people, and I pray that they may ever remain beyond the control of any other earthly power.

It may be urged, that the same abuse might take place, even if the States were divided into districts according to the plan proposed, as the voice of the minorities would be suppressed in the different districts. The contingencies upon which such abuse could happen are very remote, as the fractions of votes lost on the one side in one district, would probably be balanced by those on the other side in another district: the probable result of the votes of all the districts, where numerous, would be as fair an expression of the public will as can possibly be obtained, unless we resort to a general vote of the people at large, without regard to the division of the States. The more numerous the districts in a State, the more fair will be the representation. The chances of coming at a just expression of the public will in districts, is greater than that of coming at the same result in States, as the number of districts is to the number of States.

It may be said, that where two candidates contend for the Chief Magistracy, each possessing the qualifications necessary for the high station, it could make no serious difference to the Union which of the two should succeed; and if the candidate having the smaller number of suffrages, upon a fair vote, should succeed by the intrigues of his friends, it would create no dangerous commotion. The danger is not that the affairs of our Government shall be administered by the second, instead of the first, man in the Union, between whom there might be no great difference in point of honor, integrity, talent, or information; but it is from the difficulty of preserving the peace of the country under a President imposed upon us by violence or fraud. Are we to suppose, that a large majority of the people, knowing that they possess, numerically and physically, a great preponderance in the general scale of strength, will submit to a Chief Magistrate imposed upon them by the intrigues of faction?

If we presume that a President, however worthy or however able, placed in his Chair by any indirection, shall be quietly submitted to by the citizens of the United States, we presume upon a mildness, a forbearance, a tameness, not to be found in the American character.

Perhaps the larger States will feel a reluctance to adopt a measure, which will in some degree curtail their power of forming combinations with each other, and thus controlling their sister States; but, the very disposition thus to combine and control, is a dangerous and tyrannical principle, and if attempted would lead to counter combinations, on the part of the middle size and smaller States. Besides, there is much more probability of collision than of concert, among the large States. But, their combinations and their collisions are about equally to be dreaded. The plan of having two of the Electors appointed in each State as the Legislature should direct, and the others chosen in districts, is keeping up the Federative feature of our Constitution; as the two to be appointed may be considered as analogous to the Senators, and the others to the Representatives in Congress; and such seems to have been the meaning of the convention, by making the number of Electors equal to the number of Senators and Representatives. This circumstance is not very important, but it has some weight in favor of the proposed amendment—a much greater recommendation is, that it renders double districts for Representatives and Electors unnecessary. There is great simplicity in the plan of single districts; they are but little subject to confusion and mistakes, and as they are to be modelled but once in ten years, there will be but little difficulty in their arrangement.

The present amendment, if adopted, introduces no new principles into the Constitution. It only renders it obligatory upon the States, to adopt a system permanently, which nearly all of them have adopted temporarily, which some have pursued, and which all ought to have pursued uniformly.

It does not abridge the just rights of any State, but adds to the security of all. It throws no obstacles in the way of those worthy patriots who are aiming by fair and honorable means to reach the highest summit of distinction which a great and free people can confer, but it rather promotes their views by suppressing those extensive and dangerous intrigues which agitate the Union, at the approach of every Presidential election.

In a discussion which took place in the Senate upon this subject two years ago, it was mentioned, but not urged, that the provision respecting the election of Representatives to Congress, seemed unnecessary, as Congress had already the power by the Constitution to regulate the election of Representatives. I believe this provision in the Constitution was inserted to guard against a possible case, of a combination of particular States, to stop the progress of the Government, by refusing to send Representatives to Congress. In this point of view the provision was a wise one, but it will never be resorted to, except in cases when States neglect or refuse to make provision for electing Representatives. Congress could not, under that provision, pass a law, making it obligatory upon the Legislature of a State, to divide it into election districts; and, should Congress attempt to divide the States into districts they would involve themselves in a task of infinite difficulty, as well as one that would bring upon them the highest degree of odium; for, it would be considered as a sort of degradation, on the part of any State, to be divided into districts, without the consent of its Legislature.

Although I think the amendment proposed is much more important as it respects the choice of Electors, than as it respects the election of Representatives, yet, in this, some correction is loudly called for. The unwarrantable means resorted to by the dominant parties in the respective States, to establish and retain an undue share of power, is slowly and imperceptibly sapping the fundamental principles of our Government. A want of respect for popular elections may be considered a most unfavorable symptom in our political progress, yet, what respect can we possibly have for popular elections, exercised under the systems of gerrymandering that have been adopted in some States? Such elections are a mere mockery of the right of suffrage.

In our National Legislature, the House of Representatives is emphatically called the popular branch: it ought so to be, and was intended so to be, by the framers of the Constitution. The House of Representatives should be a fair representation, not of the States, as the Senate is, but of the citizens—the people at large. It would be thought preposterous to appoint the Representatives by a vote of the Legislatures, even if the Constitution were as vague in this particular, as it is with respect to the choice of Electors; because, it would leave to the Representative, no feature of a popular branch; yet, generally, we come precisely to the same result, when we choose them by a general ticket. It is equally subversive of the views of those who consider the popular branch the great prop and stay of our Government; yet, we begin to look upon this mode of election, especially in the small States, almost without disapprobation. The large States, if no corrective be applied, will, in their own defence, adopt the same practice; and even the good State of North Carolina, which has hitherto been conscientiously scrupulous upon this subject, and which has long been endeavoring to accomplish this necessary reform in our Constitution, will be compelled to follow the example of her more ambitious neighbors, to adopt a system which she abhors, and to choose her Electors as well as Representatives with a general ticket.

This mode of election, when generally adopted, will be attended with consequences of a dangerous character. It will suspend or destroy every feature of popular election, as it respects Representatives in Congress. By totally suppressing the voice of the minorities in the several States, it will greatly increase the rancour and bitterness of party. It will give to the geographical divisions of our country an aspect of political hostility; and will cherish an uncharitable, unsocial, and clannish disposition, to which we may already ascribe no small share of the embarrassments and calamities which our Government has heretofore experienced.

When Mr. DICKERSON concluded—

The amendment was advocated by Mr. MAGON, and opposed by Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. DAGGETT. The question was finally postponed to Wednesday next.

THURSDAY, February 12.

The PRESIDENT communicated a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting a report of the Director of the Mint, giving the result of sundry assays made of the several species of foreign gold and silver coins made current in the United States by an act of Congress passed the 29th of April, 1816; and the letter and report were read.

The bill for the relief of Martin Warner was read a third time, and passed.

Mr. SANFORD presented the petition of William Hill, and others, inhabitants of the city of New York and town of Salem, praying to be allowed the interest on certain debenture bonds, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. DAGGETT gave notice, that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a resolution authorizing the further distribution of certain public documents.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the time allowed by the act to provide for designating, surveying, and granting the military bounty lands, approved May 6, 1812, to non-commissioned officers and soldiers of the United States, or their representatives, to present their claims to the Secretary of War for military bounty lands.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was recommitted the bill to increase the salaries of the judges of the circuit court for the District of Columbia, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the same committee, in pursuance of instructions, reported a bill to increase the compensation of certain judges of the courts of the United States; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, offered instructions from the Legislature of the State of Mississippi, to their Senators in Congress, on the subject of the eastern limits of that State; which were received and read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred on the 16th of December, 1817, the memorial of the Mississippi Convention, on the same subject.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, on the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States a certain salary; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, supplementary to the act, entitled "An act further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to authorize certain purchasers of public land to withdraw their entries, and transfer the moneys paid thereon; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House; and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Richard M. Johnson, together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee of Claims; and the amendment having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

MILITARY SERVICE.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the managers on the part of the Senate, at the conference upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1818," made the following report:

"That the conferees of the House of Representatives commenced the conference by stating, that

"By the construction of the law of 1812, which the Committee of the House of Representatives believe to be adopted by that House, the pay of a brevet commission is due only when the officer exercises a command, to which his lineal rank would not entitle him. To such command, under the President's general order of 1816 and 1817, he may be assigned upon special and temporary occasions. It is believed, from the amendment proposed by the Senate, that their construction is not very different from this. The construction of the War Department, however, is very different. The Committee of the House of Representatives consider it wrong to explain or amend any act by which salaries or pay is regulated by the provisions of an appropriation law. But if it were right, the short debate which occurred in the House of Representatives on the Senate's amendment sufficiently proves, that the adoption of that amendment might change a little the ground of argument, but would not terminate the controversy.

"As an amendment of the law of 1812, the provision proposed by the Senate is, therefore, unsatisfactory; and to insist upon an appropriation previous to an amendment, is to insist either that the one body shall conform its appropriations (not to its own construction of existing laws, but) to that of the other body, or that both shall adopt, what both believe to be erroneous, the construction of the Executive Government.

Military Service.

SENATE.

"The Committee of the House of Representatives believe that respect for the rights of both Houses, requires that the act of 1812 should be amended, by defining more precisely the contingencies in which brevet pay shall be due; or, if this be impracticable, by authorizing it in all cases, or in none. The bill which passed the House of Representatives at its last session may explain the amendment which it then preferred; but it now insists only that the amending law should first determine to whom pay is due, before an appropriation should be made for its payment.

"The Committee of the House of Representatives consider it necessary to fair and free legislation, that appropriations in regard to the propriety or the extent of which the two Houses find, after deliberation, that they still differ, should be separated from those which both consider as necessary to the public service. If either branch of the Legislature determine that it will not make the great mass of necessary appropriations while there remains one unprovided for which it considers to be proper, it throws upon the other branch the necessity of concurring in an appropriation which it may believe that neither the law nor the public interest requires, or of endangering all the appropriations of the Government. The Committee of the House of Representatives hope that the appropriations which both Houses deem necessary will be made; and that the appropriation for brevet officers, which the Senate suggests, will be left to be provided for, when an amendment to the act of 1812 shall determine what that appropriation ought to be."

"The conferees on the part of the Senate admitted that doubts might exist as to the proper construction of the act of 1812, allowing pay to brevet officers, and that it might be found expedient to remove such doubts by an explanatory law, defining, more precisely, the contingencies in which such pay should be allowed; but as, according to the construction given that law by the House of Representatives, as stated by their conferees, which accords, substantially, with that contained in the Senate's amendment, expenditures to a certain extent would be legally authorized under it, and must be supposed to have taken place, and to continue to take place, until the law shall be altered, the conferees of the Senate were of opinion that an appropriation sufficient to cover such probable expenditure ought now to be made, without waiting for the passage of such explanatory law. They did not think such law should be made to have a retrospective operation, so as to affect expenditures legally incurred before its passage; nor could they perceive how the passage of such a law could be deemed necessary to determine the propriety of making an appropriation to meet an expenditure which it could not regulate. They admitted that, generally, it would not be the most correct course to amend a law establishing salaries, or authorizing an expenditure, by a provision in a general appropriation law, though they believed there was no Constitutional or legal objection to such a course; but they stated further: 1st. That the Senate's amendment was not designed as an alteration of the law of 1812, but only expressing the construction of that law which appeared to the Senate the correct one, and restricting the sum appropriated to the discharge of expenditures incurred pursuant to such instruction; which, it is presumed, may be done on the same principle that other specific appropriations are made applicable to the objects designated, and to no other. 2d. If the objection be to the words in the Senate's amendment, which restricts the application of the sum appropriated to services performed by brevet officers, when acting in their brevet rank, the conferees of the Senate would agree to strike out those words, and have the sum appropriated applicable to services performed by such officers generally, agreeably to the terms of the estimates. Though the conferees of the Senate were willing to admit that, generally, it would not be advisable to embarrass a measure embracing the mass of appropriations deemed necessary, by insisting on one of a doubtful nature, they did not consider the argument as in any degree affecting the present case, the appropriation insisted on by them not being doubtful in its nature; because, according to any fair construction that can be given the law of 1812, and adopting that preferred by the House of Representatives, some expenditure is authorized, and must be presumed to take place under it, before an explanatory law can be passed; and an appropriation to meet such expenditure did not appear to them of a doubtful nature, and on such alone they insisted. It appeared also to the conferees of the Senate, that the construction given the law for several years by the Government, and acquiesced in by the Congress, allowing brevet officers such pay as is now asked, gave those officers reasonable ground to expect a continuance thereof, so long as the law continued in force; and as the expenditure now proposed to be provided for did not arise out of any new construction of the law, and had, at least in part, already accrued, they considered it the duty of the two Houses to provide for it in the general appropriation law, and not leave it to be provided for in an act which may or may not pass; and they could see no ground for postponing the appropriation now insisted on by them, that would not equally apply to any other asked for, to meet an expenditure already incurred, under any law that it might be suggested required amendment.

"The conferees of the Senate stated explicitly they would not insist on making at this time any appropriation, with a view of coercing an expenditure which should accrue subsequent to the period at which an explanatory law relating to the matter in question could be supposed to pass, and which might, therefore, be either authorized or controlled by such law; and though the sum requisite to meet the expenditures that must accrue under the existing law, before it can be altered, could not be exactly ascertained, it might be ascertained with nearly the same accuracy that sums for other objects are, and therefore its uncertainty appeared to them to form no solid objection to the measure.

"For the purpose, therefore, of providing for such expenditure alone as must in any event take place, and leaving the two Houses to act in regard to the subject in future as each should consider correct, without being considered in any manner compromised by the appropriation that might now be made, and anxious to reconcile, as far as practicable, the views entertained by both Houses on this subject, by meeting those of the House of Representatives as far as in their opinion a due regard to correct legislation and the duty they owe the Senate would authorize, the conferees of the Senate proposed, if the conferees of the House of Representatives would agree thereto, to modify the Senate's amendment so as to read as follows:

"For additional pay, rations, and forage, to officers having brevet commissions, when commanding separate posts, districts, or detachments, requiring them to act in their brevet rank during the months of January, February, and March, of the present year, nine thousand dollars.

"The conferees of the House of Representatives refused to agree to this proposal; and as they neither proposed nor suggested any modification of said amendment, to which they would give their assent, the conference, after being continued as long as there was any prospect of arriving at a favorable result, terminated without the conferees of the two Houses being able to come to any agreement on the subject thereof."

The report was read.

SURVIVING OFFICERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

Agreeably to the special order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs; and the question recurring on the motion to postpone the further consideration of the bill until the first Monday in July next—

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, as it appeared to be the disposition of the Senate, when this subject was under discussion some days past, to go into the merits of the bill now before you, upon the question of postponement, submitted by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, I must conform to that wish, although I had much rather that the discussion could have been deferred until the bill had been so modelled as to have approached more nearly to the wishes of all.

I hope the motion for a postponement of this bill to a day beyond the session will not be carried, as I consider it a high and solemn duty incumbent upon us to make some remuneration to the worthy and indigent men who are now presented to our attention. The feelings of all who have delivered their opinions upon this subject seem to be in accordance with the object of this bill; but difficulties arise on every side that appear to be insurmountable, the greatest of which is, to what class of men we shall direct our benevolence. The merits of all have been exhibited to view, and we are told, if we discriminate we shall do injustice; and if we include all, that the finances of the country will be exhausted in the undertaking. It is not my purpose, sir, to detract from the merits of any; but surely, Mr. President, if there is any one definite class of men more meritorious than another; if there are any men in this country, who, by their services and sufferings, have rendered themselves most dear to our recollections, and most worthy of our gratitude, they are the officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army. If they are infirm, we ought to sustain them; if they are indigent, we ought first to help them.

The objections which have been offered to the question now before us are formidable, from their number and variety. It will be proper for me in the first place to examine these objections, not with the arrogant pretension of effectually doing them away, but of endeavoring to place them in such a point of view as in some degree to impair their force, and to render them less imposing than they have been considered.

It is objected, that the Revolutionary officers and soldiers have no claim against the Government; that all that was ever promised them has been given, and all that was ever stipulated has been complied with. It is not pretended by any of the advocates of this measure that these men have any strict claim in law, but the expectation is most ardently and sincerely entertained that a case can be made out that will authorize (and we hope induce) a grateful country to make them the objects of generous munificence.

By various resolutions of the old Congress, certain officers of the Revolutionary Army were to be placed on half-pay for life. This half-pay was afterwards commuted for five years' full-pay. From whom the proposition of commutation came, is a disputed point; and as I do not know that it has any material bearing upon this question, I will forbear to inquire into it. The origin of the commutation is to be traced to those murmurings and discontents which were exhibited in many parts of the country against the half-pay establishment; and those who were to receive it, notwithstanding the pledges of devotion to their country which they had given in the field, were met with the opprobrious epithets of hireling, mercenary, and pensioner! It is to the prejudice which existed everywhere amongst us, against the country from which we had been separated, and against every establishment similar to her's, that we are to look for the cause of this sensation. It is allowable to call it a prejudice, sir; for, what we term a prejudice now, was a virtue then. The superior officers in the Army, who were the oldest, first agreed to this commutation. At their time of life, the bargain was a pretty good one, if they had been paid in good money; but not so with the young officers, who constituted by far the greater portion. Yet these, under the influence of their superior officers, to whom, from habits of discipline and long-tried confidence, they had ever looked with a veneration that knew no change, and with an affection that found no limit, at length consented, and accepted the commutation. It seemed to be the last chance—the only hope. No sooner had they accepted the terms, and received the final settlement certificate, as the evidence of the debt due them from the Government, than their necessities forced them into the hands of the remorseless speculator, and they sold the reward of their toils—some for eighteen pence, some for two shillings, and some (more fortunate than the rest) for half a crown in the pound.

Let us pause a moment, sir, and endeavor to estimate the probable sacrifice that was made by these unfortunate men. I shall not in my calculation expect to be perfectly exact, but I shall be sufficiently so to enable the Senate to form a clear opinion upon the subject:

FEBRUARY, 1818.

Surviving Officers of the Revolution.

SENATE.

Captain's pay per month	$40
	12
Per year	$480
Commutation, (five years' pay)	$2,400
Arrearage due at time of disbanding Army, two and a half years' pay, about fifty per cent. on commutation	1,200
	$3,600
This, estimated at two shillings and sixpence in the pound, as the final settlement certificates were sold, is reduced to	450

A sum less than one year's pay.

A captain's pay is always taken as a fair average in the Army, on which to found calculation. The pay of a captain was forty dollars a month—four hundred and eighty dollars a year. The commutation of five years' full-pay would amount to twenty-four hundred dollars. There was due at the time of disbanding the Army about two years' and a half pay, or fifty per cent. upon the amount of commutation. This added to the commutation would be twelve hundred dollars more; making in all thirty-six hundred dollars. A final settlement for thirty-six hundred dollars, with a captain, sold by him then at two-and-sixpence in the pound, or thirty-three and a third cents in the two dollars, and sixty-six and two-thirds of a cent, would give him about four hundred and fifty dollars—a sum less than the pay for one year for his whole commutation and arrearages. If it is remarked that the act of selling was his own, I reply, it was his necessity, and not his will, consented—a necessity produced by the incapacity of the country to pay him in money of value.

But, how was it with those who had it in their power to hold their certificates? Let us recur again to the pay of a captain in the Army:

A final settlement certificate to a captain is passed for commutation and arrearages, bearing interest of six per cent. per annum, from the year 1783	$3,600
Interest for six years	1,296

But, instead of paying the sum, the interest is converted into a three per cent. stock; thus sinking one-half of it, viz: - $648

The principal of $3,600, instead of being paid, is converted into a six per cent. stock, two-thirds of which bears a present interest of six per cent., and the interest of six per cent. on the remaining one-third is deferred (not to be paid) for ten years; making a loss of six per cent. for ten years, on $1,200, of - 720

Total loss of a captain, by mode of payment - $1,368

Add interest upon that amount to the present time.

The certificate of final settlement for thirty-six hundred dollars purported upon its face to bear an interest of six per cent. until paid. It was passed in 1783. Six years afterwards, Congress, unable to pay off these claims, had recourse to the plan of funding them, and instead of paying the six years' six per cent. interest upon the certificate of thirty-six hundred dollars, (which would have been twelve hundred and ninety-six dollars,) they converted that interest into a stock bearing three per cent. interest. Thus, by the very act of conversion, saving to the Government and taking from the captain half the amount of his interest, (equal to six hundred and forty-eight dollars;) for, if any interest was due, it was six per cent. Again. The amount of principal, being thirty-six hundred dollars, was also converted into a stock bearing six per cent. interest, two-thirds of which was to bear a present interest of six per cent. and the interest upon the remaining third was deferred for ten years, saving again to the Government the interest of six per cent. upon twelve hundred dollars for ten years, which is equal to seven hundred and twenty dollars; thus, the Government saved to itself, out of the money due a captain, by the mode of payment which it adopted, six hundred and forty-eight dollars of the interest due him, and seven hundred and twenty dollars by withholding the interest upon one-third of his principal for ten years, making, in the whole, the sum of thirteen hundred and sixty-eight dollars. Instead, then, of paying the captain the amount of principal and interest due him by the evidence of his certificate from under the hand of the Government, their necessities compelled them to have recourse to a system of payment to which the creditor was not a party, that saved to the Government the sum of thirteen hundred and sixty-eight dollars, and took it from him to whom it was justly due. I do not pretend to say, sir, that this constitutes a debt at this time of day, according to, and recoverable by law; but to my mind it creates an obligation to make some remuneration, against which neither time nor circumstances can avail.

I know full well, Mr. President, that it was the depressed condition of the finances of the country at that time, that produced this calamitous state of things. I am aware of it, and I regret it. The condition of the nation, then, was that of an unfortunate debtor, who had stopped payment with a prospect of more ample resources at a future day, and called upon her creditors, who were her benefactors, and made the most equitable and fair composition with them that she could. It is now, sir, when this debtor, our country, is opulent, and powerful, and prosperous, that we desire her to do, what every honorable member in this Senate, I am persuaded, would do in his own private capacity, I mean to remunerate those who had sustained losses in consequence of her former disability to discharge her just debts.

Other objections to this bill are derived from the various classes of men who served and suffered in the Revolution. We are told of those who served in the councils of the country at that time—of those who suffered from the ravages of the enemy, and from the destructive neighborhood wars, which existed in some of the States, in consequence of a difference of sentiment—and lastly, of the militia. And, as a strengthener to all, we are told, that the States individually have done much for the officers and soldiers of the Revolution. Mr. President, towards those illustrious men who filled the councils of this country, during the great Revolutionary struggle, I can feel nothing but the most exalted reverence, and respect, and admiration. It was to their steady perseverance and unshaken fortitude, that we owe the success of that contest which gave independence to this country. Their wisdom, their constancy, and their fidelity, will ever be remembered. But what they planned in council, your army sustained in the field. If they toiled and watched over your destinies, they had some periods of time that they could devote to their families and their private concerns—they had it in their power to pay some attention to domestic cares—and, in the midst of their faithful labors, their health was taken care of; they were plentifully fed, and comfortably lodged at night. Not so with your army: Half-starved, half-naked, tracked in their course by the blood from their unshod feet, they followed their Heaven-directed leader with heroic constancy and courage—defying the elements—exposed to every vicissitude of season and of weather—bearing up against the multiplied calamities of the most ill provided warfare, they sunk from their toils to catch a moment of repose upon the frozen field, uncovered, except by the skies. Sir, there is no comparison between the sufferings of these men; and as little between their present condition, arising from the difference of that service.

Whatever may have been the misfortunes of those who were injured by the fury of the enemy, or of their neighborhood wars, it is impossible at this time of day to estimate. The case is remediless with all its horrors. We have seen the difficulty, for some years past, of providing for the destruction committed in the late war. Two years have been consumed in establishing the principles which shall govern in those cases, and yet every day a memorial is laid upon our table, asking redress for cases not included in the law. If such difficulties are felt on account of losses of such recent date, how can we hope to redress those where time has swallowed up both the parties and the evidence; and gentlemen must excuse me, sir, for saying, that I do not consider it altogether fair to introduce an impracticable case against us, and then deny that we ought to do that which is feasible, because we don't do that which is impossible.

As for the militia, sir, their services were often useful, often admirable—but their employment was very different from that of the Continental army. The militia were generally employed for short periods, and not taken far from home; their services were mostly performed in defence of their own neighborhood, and their fatigues and exposure were comparatively small when contrasted with that of the regular army. As to the rewards which the States have benevolently bestowed upon such of the officers and soldiers as were within their respective limits, it does them much honor, but we cannot shelter ourselves under the charity of others. It was for the nation at large that these men fought and bled; it was for the country they encountered all their hardships, and it is from the national Treasury they ought to be reimbursed.

But the greatest objection of all, is the supposed exorbitancy of the sum necessary for the object. This is the point at which I fear we shall falter. Perhaps a little examination into this point may diminish the obstacles that our alarms have created. There is no certain evidence to which we can have recourse at this time to ascertain, with exactness, the number of surviving officers and soldiers of the Continental army. Various calculations have been made by those who may be supposed to have the most accurate means of information, and these have proved unsatisfactory. The only document we can find upon the subject, is the number of men discharged at the time the army was disbanded, which was about thirteen thousand five hundred—if to this is added one-fourth of that amount, to include those who have been discharged after one, two or three years' service, we shall have in the whole the number of 16,875 men. A better computation can be made of the officers, who are more known in the community, and who are generally recorded in the society of the Cincinnati. They are estimated at rather more than two hundred survivors, being one tenth of the whole. If we calculate the men by this mode, and it will be an extravagant calculation—for in all the estimates of human life the most precarious hold, the greatest mortality, is always found to be among that class of men, who from their condition are most exposed, least attended to, and most destitute of essential comforts. If, I remark, we adopt this mode of calculation, we shall have 1,614 survivors of the non-commissioned officers and privates of the Continental army—a number, one third if not one-half exceeding what any intelligent Revolutionary officer now alive believes to be the true one. Taking then the estimate, at this large calculation, of two hundred officers and sixteen hundred and eighty-seven privates, the whole amount of half pay per annum to each (estimating a captain's half-pay as the measure of that of the officers) would not exceed one hundred and fifteen thousand four hundred and eighty dollars, a sum inconsiderable in itself when compared with the object, and a sum that will diminish in an accelerated ratio every year, until, in ten years from this, there will not be a tenth remaining to be paid. If there is an error in this statement, it unquestionably is by making the estimate too large, and when we come to reflect upon the object to be accomplished, and the means necessary for the purpose, I trust that we shall neither feel hesitation nor reluctance.

It ought not to be objected to this statement, that the disparity in the amount received by each is too great. We do not make that disparity—it is already created to our hand. We take them, officer and soldier, as we find them, and measure out to each according to what they had been accustomed to receive. There is no other standard that I know of, in conferring benevolences, or honorary pecuniary rewards to military men, than the rank they hold; and if the amount to each soldier is a trifle, the very circumstance of its being small will enable us the better to afford it. But you may rest assured, sir, that, small as it is, it will be wealth and comfort to many poor soldiers—it will smooth the remnant of their road to the grave, and perhaps enable them to close their eyes in peace.

But, Mr. President, there are other motives which, in my judgment, are strong and coercive to the adoption of this measure. I mean those, sir, of national feeling and national character, which are involved in the issue of this bill, and which I do not think we are at liberty by any means to disregard. Shall it be said, sir, that the brave officers and soldiers of the Revolution were abandoned by us in their advanced age and infirmities, to the precarious offerings of public charity; to the protection of the almshouse, and such receptacles of human wretchedness, whilst the Treasury of the country is ample to relieve them? Shall the history of our country add another instance for those with whom "the ingratitude of Republics" is a maxim? Shall the veterans of the Army of Independence, whose wants and infirmities arise from having devoted the best portion of their lives to the service of their country, now languish in penury, neglected by that country? Feeling as I do upon this occasion, sir, I exult in the opportunity which is this day presented me, of doing honour to my country by doing justice to her brave defenders; and I do not now appeal to the cold and calculating policy of the politician, but to the generous hearts that are near me, which will cause us to exhibit a scene not less interesting than that of the Roman charity itself, where the aged and famished fathers of our country shall draw from our bosoms the sources of life, and nutriment, and comfort.

With your permission, sir, I will now call your attention for a short time to the provisions of the bill itself, and to the nature of the amendments offered by the Committee. The bill, as it now stands, appears to be too indiscriminate, and to embrace too much, as by it every fellow that was drummed out of camp, or dismissed the service for the lowest vices, may be the object of reward; there ought certainly to be some test of serving out the period of enlistment, or of honorable discharge. The amendment, on the other hand, is too limited, and will, in my judgment, work a great injustice to many who have nobly signalized themselves in the cause of the Revolution, and are justly entitled to our grateful remembrance. The amendment, sir, confines the benefits of the bill to those alone who served until the end of the war, and debars those who served according to their enlistments for one and two years. It will operate still more unequally when we reflect, that by the language of the amendment, as it now stands, those who entered the service after the capture of Cornwallis, in October, 1781, which was the decisive blow in the conflict, and continued to the end of the war, which from that time was little more than nominal, will be rewarded, whilst those who served in the period from seventeen hundred and seventy-six to seventy-nine—the iron age of the Revolution—will be excluded. I hope this distinction will not be made.

That proviso in the law which obliges invalid pensioners to give up their pensions before they can accept the benefits of this bill, is another very objectionable feature that I cannot assent to. For what, let me ask, sir, is the pension now given to the unfortunate and wounded soldier? It is intended, in some measure, to compensate him for the loss of his limbs; it is designed as a sort of recompense for his privations, and his consequent sufferings. Will you then, sir, in the distribution of your honors and rewards among those who defended the country in arms, underrate the services of those whose mutilated frames are the evidences of those services? The pension you give is a pittance considered in itself; but when compared with the enjoyment and utility of the limb whose loss it is to supply, it is poor indeed. What wealth that you could give from your Treasury, would purchase an arm, a leg, or an eye? And when you are about to confer the reward on valor, will you first tear from the maimed hero the balm that you have given him to staunch his wound? I pray that these victims to their devotion for their country may be suffered to retain this miserable indemnity, and that they may come in for their share, with their more fortunate brethren, of the honorable rewards I hope we shall bestow.

The last objection I shall make, sir, to the bill, is to that clause which provides, that the veteran of the Revolution shall prove himself a pauper to entitle him to the gratitude and reward of his country.

If there are some of these who braved the storm of the Revolutionary war, who are so fortunate as to be wealthy and comfortable in life, and an aversion to confer this bounty on these is the cause of introducing this degrading test, be assured, sir, they are very few in number, and they will never call upon you for the gratuity; or, if they do, it will be to give it to some old and faithful brother soldier who fought by their side; and if such is to be its destination, I sincerely hope they will receive it. But if you defile your intended benevolence with a condition that degrades those who are to receive it, you will frustrate the object of the law; for there are none, I trust, so broken down as not to retain a little spark of a soldier's pride. The high and elevated spirit that would force men from their families, their homes, and their domestic endearments, to risk all that could be dear to the human heart in the field, in defence of a Constitutional principle, cannot bend for a paltry consideration to an act of self-humiliation. That spirit which braved the hazards of the field and the terrors of the law for the establishment of your independence, will not now bend abased before you. It will spurn the polluted bounty you present, and prefer poverty, with all its pangs, to the ignoble sacrifice of a soldier's feeling. No, sir, it will not do to degrade those you mean to reward. It will not do to see that hand, which once grasped the sword that flashed defiance upon your foes, now lifted in humble, supplicating charity, and trembling with decrepitude and age. What you give, give freely—it will become you. Do not cloud the brow with shame, that you wish to cheer with your benevolence; but remember, that much of every good consists in the manner of conferring it, and that you enhance the merit of every gift by a delicate and tender regard to the feelings of those on whom you bestow it.

With these impressions, I sincerely hope that we shall pass a bill for the relief of the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war, in which neither the name of pensioner, nor the test of poverty will be admitted; and that the only proof they will be called on to give, to receive their country's bounty, will be, that they served in the Continental Army in defence of American independence.

I again renew the wish I have before expressed, sir, that the motion for postponement will not prevail, but that we shall all cordially co-operate to complete the great object of this bill, and make it worthy of ourselves and our country. That done, I am persuaded that we shall all feel that we have discharged a great duty, and that every heart will bear testimony to the truth of that sublime and heartfelt precept—that it is better to give than to receive.

When Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH concluded—

The bill was advocated by Messrs. DAGGETT, KING, MORRILL, CRITTENDEN, RUGGLES, LEAKE, FROMENTIN, OTIS, and VAN DYKE; and opposed by Messrs. BARBOUR, MACON, and SMITH.

FRIDAY, February 13.

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of Martin Dubbs, of the city of Philadelphia, praying relief in the settlement of his account for supplies to a large body of militia in the service of the United States, for the defence of the fourth military district, in the autumn of 1814, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, gave notice that to-morrow he should ask leave to bring in a bill for the purchase and distribution of the laws of the United States.

Mr. DAGGETT asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution, authorizing the further distribution of certain public documents; and the resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MORROW presented the petition of Duncan McArthur, praying to be permitted to locate other lands in lieu of those entered in the land office of Richard C. Anderson, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. LACOCK presented the memorial of a number of journeymen tailors, of the city of Philadelphia, praying relief by the imposition of additional duties on the importation of ready-made clothing; and the memorial was read.

The bill, supplementary to the act entitled "An act further extending the time for issuing and locating military land warrants, and for other purposes," was read a third time; the blanks were filled first with "1st of March," and second, with "1st of October," and the bill was passed.

The bill to authorize certain purchasers of public land to withdraw their entries, and transfer the moneys paid thereon, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Richard M. Johnson was read a third time, and passed.

The bill to increase the compensation of certain judges of the courts of the United States, was read the second time.

Agreeably to the special order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor; and, on motion, by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Arthur St. Clair," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs; and the question recurring on the motion, that the further consideration thereof be postponed until the first Monday in July next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 3, nays 30, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Macon, and Smith.

NAYS—Messrs. Ashmun, Burrill, Campbell, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Eppes, Fromentin, Gailard, Goldsborough, Hunter, King, Lacock, Leake, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Troup, Van Dyke, Williams of Massachusetts, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

On motion, by Mr. TALBOT, the further consideration of the bill, together with the amendments, was postponed until Monday next.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, February 16.

The PRESIDENT communicated the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, to whom was referred the petition of Robert Sturges; and the report was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAGGETT presented the petition of Joseph Hall, praying the payment of his commutation of five years' pay, to which he was entitled as lieutenant of artillery in the Revolutionary army ; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:
To the Senate of the United States :

In compliance with a resolution of the 28th January last I now transmit to the Senate a statement of the expenditures upon the public buildings, and an account of their progress, for the year 1818.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, February 13, 1818.

The Message and accompanying documents were read.

Mr. TAYLOR presented the petition of the citizens of the town of Vincennes, praying Congress to vest the fee simple of the common adjoining said town in the trustees thereof, for the purpose of draining and selling the same, for reasons stated in the petition ; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post route from Freehold, in the county of Monmouth, New Jersey, through Squancum, Manasquan, Toms river, Cedar creek, and Nanahawkin, to Tuckerton, in the county of Burlington.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of Alexander Levie, a soldier in the Revolutionary army, praying payment of arrearages, as stated in the petition ; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of a great number of dry good merchants, traders, and master tailors, in the city of Philadelphia, representing their peculiar grievances, and praying relief ; and the petition was read.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House adhere to their disagreement to the first amendment insisted on by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the military service of the United States for the year 1818."

On motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Senate proceeded to consider the report of the Committee of Conference, on their part, made the 12th instant, upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the bill last mentioned.

Whereupon, on motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Senate resolved to recede from their first amendment to the said bill.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for adjusting the claims to land, and establishing land offices in the districts east of the island of New Orleans ; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. TAIT, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to authorize the establishment of naval depots and dock yards ; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the memorials of certain officers of the Navy, and of the Marine Corps, attached to the Mediterranean squadron ; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States, a sum equal to the salary of the judge of the district court of South Carolina, for the term of one year, during which time the said circuit judge was compelled by law to perform the duties of the judge of said district court ; and in concurrence therewith,

Resolved, That no compensation, in addition to his regular stated salary, ought to be allowed to the judge of the sixth circuit court of the United States, for the duties devolved upon, and performed by him, in consequence of the disability of the district judge of South Carolina.

The Senate resumed the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Weaver Bennet ; and the consideration thereof was further postponed until the second Monday in March next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 12th instant, for instructing the Committee on Public Lands to inquire into the expediency of extending the time allowed by the act, approved May 6, 1812, to present claims to the Secretary of War, for military bounty lands ; and agreed thereto.

On motion, by Mr. EPPES, the further consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Arthur St. Clair," was postponed until Thursday next.

The resolution providing for the further distribution of certain public documents, was read the second time.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, asked and obtained leave to bring in a bill to provide for the purchase and distribution of the laws of the United States ; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. GOLDBOROUGH, the consideration of the bill respecting the transportation of persons of color, for sale, or to be held to labor, was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Thursday next.

ENCOURAGEMENT TO EMIGRANTS.

Mr. SANFORD presented the memorial of the New York Irish Emigrant Association, praying that a portion of unsold lands (in the Illinois Territory) may be set apart, or granted to trustees, for the purpose of being settled by emigrants from Ireland, on an extended term of credit, as stated in the memorial ; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The memorial is as follows :

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

The memorial of the New York Irish Emigrant Association respectfully sheweth : That your memorialists, while they presume most respectfully to solicit your attention to the helpless and suffering condition of the numerous foreigners who, flying from a complicated mass of want and misery, daily seek an asylum in the bosom of the United States, are emboldened by the recollection that a liberal encouragement to the settlement of meritorious strangers has always characterized the Government and constituted authorities of the Union. The wise and brave founders of its independence held out to the oppressed and suffering of every nation the consoling assurance that in this country, at least, they should find a refuge and a home. The successors of these illustrious men have continued to redeem, in calmer and happier times, the pledge made to philosophy and benevolence amidst perilous scenes of distress and difficulty. From this humane and beneficent policy America has reaped a rich and happy harvest. She has added to the national resources the moral and physical strength to be derived from so many thousands and tens of thousands, who, actuated by attachment to her free Constitution, have adopted the nation where liberty has made, and is making, her most glorious stand, as the country of their choice.

Your memorialists, in addressing your honorable body, need not seek to enforce by argument the generally received maxim of political economy that the wealth and solidity of a nation consist in the number, the social comforts, and the productive industry of its people. In the dense and crowded States, and under the existing Governments of Europe, these sources of wealth and stability are not always found well combined. It frequently does not happen that the social comforts, or even the productive industry, are proportioned to the number of the people. In the extended territory and scattered population of the United States, however, and under their free and blessed institutions, it is an unquestionable and important truth, that every increase of inhabitants, when wisely and judiciously distributed and settled, adds to the social comforts and productive industry of the whole, and that the excess of population, which cannot be considered as giving stability to the various Governments of Europe, if suffered or encouraged to settle here, would incalculably increase our wealth and strength. But that accession is doubly valuable which also brings to the common fund, with a mass of laborious industry, unalterable attachment to the laws and constitution of the country. And, surely, to give a wise direction to that industry, and to secure by well-placed kindness that attachment, are among the noblest exercises of legislative authority.

Your memorialists beg leave respectfully to represent that at no period since the establishment of American independence have the people of Europe, particularly the laboring classes, discovered so great a disposition as at present to emigrate to the United States. But the people of Ireland, from the peculiar pressures under which that country has so long been placed, have flocked hither in the greatest number, and perhaps under the most trying and necessitous circumstances. They come, indeed, not to return and carry back the profits of casual speculations, but to dedicate to the land of their hopes their persons, their families, their posterity, their affections, their all.

It is, however, a truth, regretted by those who have the best means of observation, that, for want of guides to their steps, and congenial homes, where all their honest energies might be called at once into activity, and their hardy enterprise turned to their own advantage, as well as to the general good, they remain perplexed, undecided, and dismayed, by the novelty and difficulty of their situations. They have fled from want and oppression—they touch the soil of freedom and abundance; but the manna of the wilderness melts in their sight. Before they can taste the fruits of happy industry, the tempter too often presents to their lips the cup that turns man to brute, and the very energies which would have made the fields to blossom make the cities groan. Individual benevolence cannot reach this evil. Individuals may indeed solicit, but it belongs to the chosen guardians of the public weal to administer the cure. Nor is the misdirection or the destruction of the capabilities and industry of these emigrants to be regretted only on its own account. The story of their blasted hopes and fortunes is transmitted back, and retailed with malicious exaggeration. Others, possessing more abundant means and more prudent habits, who have been accustomed to look with longing eyes to this free country, and contrast its happiness with the present state of Europe, are discouraged and deterred by their sufferings and misfortunes; and thus a large current of active population and wealth, inclined to flow into and enrich the United States, is dammed up at the fountain-head. A serious consideration of these circumstances induce your memorialists to hope, and most earnestly but respectfully to request, on behalf of those whose interests they urge, that a portion of unsold lands may be set apart or granted to trustees, for the purpose of being settled by emigrants from Ireland, on an extended term of credit. The conditions of this grant your memorialists wish to be such as may give to the settlers its entire benefit, and may exclude all private speculation in others. They also beg leave to suggest, after contemplating the various uncultivated tracts which invite the labor of man, that a situation adapted for a settlement of that description might be found among the lands lately purchased in the Illinois Territory.

Your memorialists are fully sensible that many of the most persuasive arguments in favor of their application must be addressed, and will not be addressed in vain, to the benevolence and sympathies of the Legislature; but they also confidently appeal to its wisdom and patriotism. The lands to which they have alluded, being frontier and remote, are neither likely to be speedily exposed to sale, to be rendered by cultivation subservient to the general prosperity, nor by settlement conducive to the general strength. The portion which might be granted on extended credit would probably be paid for almost as soon as if it had not been brought into the market before its regular turn. During that time, in which it would otherwise remain unproductive, (and therefore unprofitable,) thousands of families would have acquired opulence, would have benefited the country by its cultivation, by the establishing of schools, the opening of roads, and the other improvements of social and civilized life. They would form a nucleus round which a more abundant population would rapidly accumulate, and all the contiguous lands would be largely increased in value. The small loss which might appear to be sustained by the suspension of interest on the credit (if it should have any existence) will be abundantly compensated by the money and labor that must be almost immediately expended on works of general utility, which the convenience and necessities of the settlers will naturally induce them to accomplish. But who can calculate the physical or moral, or even the pecuniary advantages in time of war, of having such a strong and embattled frontier?

FEBRUARY, 1818.

Great Britain—Extra Duties.

SENATE.

The Irish emigrant, cherished and protected by the Government of the United States, will find his attachment to their interest increase in proportion to the benefits he has received. He will love with enthusiasm the country that affords him the means of honorable and successful enterprise, and permits him to enjoy unmolested and undiminished the fruits of his honest industry. Ingratitude is not the vice of Irishmen. Fully appreciating his comparative comforts, and the source from whence they flow, he will himself cherish, and will inculcate on his children, an unalterable devotion to his adopted and their native country. Should hostilities approach her in that quarter, whether in the savage forms of the tomahawk and scalping-knife, or with the deadlier weapon of civilized warfare, the Irish settlers, with their hardy sons, will promptly repel the invasion, drive back the war upon the enemy, and give to our extended frontier security and repose.

Your memorialists therefore humbly pray your honorable body to receive and listen favorably to their application. And, as in duty bound, they will ever pray, &c.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army;" together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The question under consideration was a motion made some days ago by Mr. KING to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee so to amend it as to confine its provisions to a grant of half-pay for life to such of the surviving officers (alone) of the Revolutionary Army as served for three years, or to the end of the war; including those entitled to half-pay for life by any resolve of Congress, the half-pay to be ascertained according to rank, by which the accounts of the officers were finally settled.

The debate was resumed on this subject, and continued till a late hour; in the course of which Mr. KING withdrew his motion to recommit the bill.

The question then recurred on the amendment reported to the bill by the Military Committee, (to confine its application to those who served to the end of the war;) when a motion was made by Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and agreed to, to amend the amendment by inserting the words "or those who served — years."

Mr. CRITTENDEN moved to strike out the words "on Continental establishment," so as to include the militia who served the requisite period; which motion was pending when the Senate adjourned.

The gentlemen who took part in the discussion this day were MESSRS. GOLDSBOROUGH, LACOCK, TICHENOR, OTIS, MORRIL, EPPES, CRITTENDEN, DAGGETT, BURRILL, MACON, and SMITH.

TUESDAY, February 17.

Mr. BARBOUR presented the petition of Samuel Miller, a brevet major of Marines, praying payment of the amount of his necessary expenses as bearer of despatches to France, as well as other advances for the service of the United States, and compensation for the loss of baggage, &c., occasioned by the destruction of the Marine barracks at Washington, in August, 1814; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House had passed a resolution, directing the Judges of the Supreme Court to be furnished with Wait's State Papers, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of Luke Tiernan and others, in behalf of the Hibernian Society of Baltimore, praying that provision may be made for granting to the emigrants from Ireland a tract of land in the Illinois Territory, on a more extended credit than is now allowed by law; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. DAGGETT presented the petition of Phineas Meigs, of Guilford, Connecticut, praying compensation for a house destroyed by the enemy during the late war with Great Britain; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. MORRIL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Stockton, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The report and resolution were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 16th instant, for instructing the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads, to inquire into the expediency of establishing a certain post route, and agreed thereto.

The bill to authorize the establishment of naval depots and dock yards was read the second time.

GREAT BRITAIN—EXTRA DUTIES.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives:

I lay before the House of Representatives copies of two communications received at the Department of State from the Minister of Great Britain, and submit to their consideration the propriety of making such legislative provisions as may be necessary for a compliance with the representations contained in them.

By the express terms of that compact it was, when ratified by the two Governments, to be in force for the term of four years from the day of its signature. The revocation of all the discriminating duties became, therefore, the obligation of both Governments from that day, and it is conceived that every individual who has been required to pay, and who has paid, any of the extra duties revoked by the Convention, has a just and lawful claim upon the respective Governments for its return. From various accidents it has happened that, both here and in Great Britain, the cessation of the extra duties has been fixed to commence at different times. It is desirable that Congress should pass an act, providing for the return of all the extra duties, incompatible with the terms of the Convention, which have been levied upon British vessels or merchandise, after the 3d of July, 1815. The British Parliament have already set the example of fixing that day for the cessation of the extra duties of export, by their act of 30th of June last, and the Minister of the United States in London is instructed to require the extension of the same principle to all the extra duties levied on vessels and merchandise of the United States in the ports of Great Britain since that day. It is not doubted that the British Government will comply with this requisition, and that the act suggested may be passed by Congress, with full confidence that the reciprocal measure will receive the sanction of the British Parliament.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, Feb. 12, 1818.

Mr. Bagot, Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary, to Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State.

WASHINGTON, Nov. 18, 1816.

SIR: I have the honor to call your attention to one of the provisions of an act of the United States Congress, passed on the 27th of April last, entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage," which appears to have originated in some misapprehension of the real nature of one of the principal manufactures of Great Britain, and which has had an operation not only very prejudicial to the British manufacturer, but contrary, as it should seem, to the spirit and intent of the second article of the commercial treaty.

By the second article of the commercial treaty between Great Britain and the United States, it is stipulated "that no higher duties shall be imposed on the importation of any articles, the growth, produce, or manufacture of His Britannic Majesty's Territories, in Europe, than are, or shall be, payable on the like articles, being the growth, produce, or manufacture of any other foreign countries."

By the act of the United States to which I have referred, it is, among other things, enacted in the 6th section, that, upon importation into the United States, iron in bars and bolts, except iron manufactured by rolling, shall pay a duty of 45 cents per cwt., and that in bars and bolts, when manufactured by rolling, and anchors, it shall pay a duty of 150 cents per cwt.

It was probably not known that the bar and bolt iron, manufactured in Great Britain, is in the last process rolled, whereas the same article, both in Sweden and in Russia, instead of being rolled, is, in the same process, hammered; but when the iron is manufactured into bar or bolt, whether by rolling or hammering, it is in precisely the same progress of manufacture, and is in every respect applicable to the same purposes of use and ulterior manufacture, and consequently is, to all intents, a "like article." But, by the inequality of the duties which have been imposed, it seems to have been imagined that rolled bar and bolt iron is in a stage of manufacture beyond that of hammered iron; and you will observe that this supposition is strengthened by the circumstance of its being classed with anchors, which are in a state of complete and finished manufacture, and are worth £35 per ton in the British market, whilst bar and bolt iron is only worth £11 per ton.

It is to be assumed that, whenever duties are imposed on any foreign article, in a graduated scale proportioned to its manufactured state, it is intended that the duty should be regulated by that state alone, and not by the process by which it is brought to that state.

Iron, in a certain state of manufacture, is to be charged with a certain duty. The means of bringing it to that state, whether by hammering or rolling, is not to be had in consideration; for if it were, the effect would be to force each nation to use exactly the same process, and, what certainly never could have been intended, to check and punish the application of ingenuity and improvement.

Considering, therefore, that the bar and bolt iron manufactured in Great Britain is, according to the true spirit and intent of the second article of the treaty of commerce, in every respect a "like article" with that manufactured in Sweden and Russia, it is hoped that such measures will be taken by the Government of the United States as will allow of its admission to importation at the same rate of duty, and will place the British manufacturer in that state of equality, in respect to foreign nations, as may accord with the undoubted intention of the late treaty of commerce between the two countries.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 8, 1817.

SIR: In my letter to the Secretary of the Department of State of the 9th of July, 1816, I had the honor to point out the difference of the periods at which effect had been given, in the two countries, to the Convention of the 3d of July, 1815, and to request that all discriminating duties of a nature similar to those described in His Royal Highness the Prince Regent's Order in Council of the 17th of August, 1815, which might have been levied between the date of that order and the 22d of the following December, upon goods imported into the United States in British-built ships, might be refunded.

No mention having been made in His Royal Highness's Order in Council of alien tonnage duties, they were not adverted to in the application which I had then the honor to make; but as it was known that they had in fact been remitted by Great Britain, the American Legislature, in strict observance of the spirit and intention of the Convention, included them in the act passed on the 3d of last March, authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to cause repayments to be made of certain alien duties. By this act, however, it was only provided that the alien tonnage duties levied upon British ships in American ports subsequently to the 17th of August, 1815, should be refunded; whereas the same duties levied upon American ships in British ports, were remitted from the date of the signature of the Convention.

In order, therefore, that His Majesty's subjects may partake of the full benefit of the reciprocity intended by the Convention, I have the honor to request that remission may also be made of the alien tonnage duties which may have been levied upon British ships in the ports of the United States between the 3d of July and the 17th of August, 1815.

I have the honor to be, with the highest consideration, sir, your most obedient humble servant,

CHARLES BAGOT.

The Message and communications therein referred to were read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill to provide for the purchase and distribution of the laws of the United States was read the second time.

SURVIVING SOLDIERS OF THE REVOLUTION.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army," together with the amendments reported thereto, by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The motion, made yesterday by Mr. CRITTENDEN, to amend the bill so as to include the militia of the Revolution, was first under consideration; and, after some debate, in which Messrs. OTIS and TAIT opposed the motion, it was negatived—ayes 7.

Mr. DAGGETT proposed to strike out the words "mariner and marine," to exclude these classes from the benefit of the provision. The motion was supported by the mover and by Mr. KING; and opposed by Messrs. TAIT, EPPES, and BURRILL, and finally lost—ayes 7.

An amendment was then taken up, reported by the Military Committee, requiring the pensions already granted by the General and State Governments to be relinquished, to entitle an applicant to the benefit of this bill.

This proposition produced considerable discussion, in which Messrs. WILLIAMS of Tennessee, OTIS, VANDYKE, LACOCK, TALBOT, EPPES, GOLDSBOROUGH, and MORRIL, bore a part. Before the question was taken,

Mr. OTIS moved to strike out the word "incapacitated," so that no proof of poverty be required. This motion was advocated by Messrs. OTIS and DAGGETT; and opposed by Messrs. WILSON, EPPES, MORRIL, and TALBOT—but, before a decision took place, the Senate adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, February 18.

Mr. HUNTER presented the memorial of the President, Directors, and Company, of the Merchants' Bank, of Newport, Rhode Island, praying the repayment of certain stamp duties, for reasons stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of Benjamin Wells, of the State of Pennsylvania, praying compensation for his services as forage-master, in the years 1779 and 1780, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill to reduce the staff of the Army; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MORROW presented the petition of William Rector, surveyor of the public lands in the Missouri and Illinois Territories, praying additional compensation for past and future services, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

On motion, by Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Hall Jervey, surveyor and inspector for the port of Charleston, were discharged from the further consideration thereof; and, on motion by Mr. SMITH, it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories who shall escape into any other State or Territory," reported the same with amendments; which were read.

Mr. WILSON presented the petition of William Gamble, praying compensation for certain services, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The resolution, brought up yesterday for concurrence, was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred a statement from the Treasury Department, showing the amount of duty which accrued on salt imported during the years 1815 and 1816, and from the 1st of January to the 30th of June, 1817; together with the amount paid for bounty on pickled fish exported, and for allowances to vessels employed in the fisheries during that period, with instructions to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law laying that duty; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that it is not expedient to repeal the law imposing a duty on salt.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act fixing the compensations of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices;" in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of War, showing the expenditure of the moneys appropriated for the contingent expenses of the Military Establishment for the year 1817; and the report was read.

Mr. BARBOUR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of changing the mode of supplying the troops of the United States by contract, and substituting one cheaper and more efficient, by subjecting the parties undertaking that duty, to military law, in case of delinquency.

The bill adjusting claims to land, and establishing land offices in the districts east of the Island of New Orleans, was read the second time.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution for an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, in relation to internal improvements, reported the same without amendment.

On motion, by Mr. DICKERSON, the consideration of the resolution proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives in Congress, and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, be further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Wednesday next.

REVOLUTIONARY PATRIOTS.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The consideration of this subject again produced a good deal of debate, chiefly on its details and propositions to alter various features of the bill. The discussion was conducted by Messrs. NOBLE, OTIS, TALBOT, LACOCK, BURRILL, EPPES, MORRIL, GOLDSBOROUGH, and VAN DYKE.

Mr. TALBOT moved to strike out of the first section of the bill, after the word "States," in the tenth line, the following words: "and are, or who hereafter shall be, reduced to indigence, and incapable of procuring subsistence, and who shall have substantiated his said incapacity, in the manner hereinafter directed;" and to add to said bill the following proviso: "Provided, That the benefits of this act shall not extend to any officer whose estate, at the time of such application, is of the value of — dollars, or to any musician or private soldier, whose estate shall, at the time of his application for such pension, be worth the sum of — dollars."

Mr. BURRILL called for a division of the question, and it was taken on striking out the words proposed, and determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Fromentin, Goldsborough, Hunter, King, Otis, Stokes, Storer, Talbot, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Dickerson, Eppes, Gailard, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Tait, Taylor, Tichenor, and Wilson.

On motion, by Mr. WILSON, the bill, as amended, was ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

THURSDAY, February 19.

DANIEL D. TOMPKINS, Vice President of the United States and President of the Senate, attended, and took the Chair.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. TICHENOR submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate, what requisitions were made upon the contractors between the first day of June, 1817, and the 24th of December, of the same year, for deposits of provisions in advance, at the several posts on the frontiers of Georgia and in the adjoining Territory, specifying the date of such requisition, the amount of deposit required, and by whom made.

Mr. LACOCK presented the memorial of the Philadelphia Irish emigrant association, praying that provision may be made for granting to the emigrants from Ireland a tract of land in the Illinois Territory, on a more extended credit than is now allowed by law; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. SMITH presented the memorial of David Bailey, of Charleston, South Carolina, praying to be allowed the amount payable by law on certain wines, as stated in the memorial; which was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TICHENOR presented the petition of John Sargent, of Vermont, praying a pension, for reasons stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, presented the petition of David Tate, of Tennessee, praying payment for services as a sergeant in the Revolutionary war, as stated in the petition; which was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Arthur St. Clair," was read a third time.

On motion by Mr. MACON, it having been agreed to take the question on the final passage of the bill, by yeas and nays, a motion was made by Mr. ROBERTS, that the bill be referred to the Committee on Pensions, with instructions to reduce the sum to be allowed as a pension, so as not to exceed that allowed by law to a Lieutenant Colonel; it was determined in the negative—yeas 14, nays 17, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Campbell, Dickerson, Eppes, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrill, Roberts, Ruggles, Smith, Stokes, Tichenor, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Burrill, Daggett, Fromentin, Gailard, Goldsborough, Hunter, King, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Van Dyke, and Wilson.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 18th instant, for instructing the Committee on Military Affairs to inquire into the expediency of changing the mode of supplying the troops of the United States by contract, and substituting one cheaper and more efficient, by subjecting the parties undertaking that duty to military law, in case of delinquency; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 19th instant, requesting information of what requisitions were made upon the contractors, between the first day of June, 1817, and the 24th of December, of the same year, for deposits of provisions in advance, at the several posts on the frontiers of Georgia, and in the adjoining Territory, specifying the date of such requisition, the amount of deposit required, and by whom made. Whereupon,

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, submitted the following as a substitute therefor:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to inform the Senate in what particular instances Benjamin G. Orr, contractor, has failed to furnish rations agreeably with his contract to the troops of the United States, and the amount of money advanced by the Government for supplies in consequence of such failures; and, also, the amount of money advanced by the Government to said Benjamin G. Orr, at or before the time of said failures.

On motion by Mr. TICHENOR, it was agreed that the further consideration thereof be postponed until Monday next.

Mr. WILSON submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate a list of all the pensioners of the United States, the sum annually paid to each, and the States or Territories in which the said pensions are respectively paid.

Mr. NOBLE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Henry Jones, made report, together with the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

The resolution and report were read.

The Senate resumed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Arthur St. Clair," it having been previously read a third time.

Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. MORRIL spoke in opposition to the bill, and Mr. KING in its support; when on the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 21, nays 10, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hunter, King, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Van Dyke, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory."

Mr. SMITH, of South Carolina, said, when this subject was first brought before the Senate, he had determined to take no part in the debate. But, as it had assumed such a complexion, both as it respects the constitutionality of the provisions of the bill itself and the subject-matter upon which it is founded, as well as the severity of the remarks used by gentlemen opposed to its passage, he considered it his duty to make some reply. The gentleman from Rhode Island (Mr. BURRILL) insists that the privilege of the writ of habeas corpus, secured by the ninth section of the first article of the Constitution, will be infringed by this bill, because a person of color taken under it cannot have the right to his freedom tried by the judge before whom the return of the writ of habeas corpus is made. Mr. S. said he pretended to no law knowledge beyond that of other gentlemen, yet he did most unequivocally deny the construction of the Constitution as given by that gentleman. The writ of habeas corpus was never intended to give a right of trial. It merely gives the right to the person confined to demand an inquiry whether he is held in custody upon a ground warranted by law; and if the judge before whom he is brought finds he is detained by legal authority and upon legal grounds, he cannot discharge him, but is obliged to remand him. If the authority by which he is held appears to be legal, it is perfectly immaterial whether the cause is a just one or not. And when a fugitive from labor has been taken under this law, the cause of his detention will be fully set forth in the certificate by the judge before whom he is to be taken, whose duty it is specially made to do so. Then can it be pretended, after you pass a law prescribing expressly under what proofs a fugitive shall be taken, and that the fugitive shall be specially described by the judge in the order he is to give for his removal, and that the proofs have been satisfactorily made before him the person therein described is a fugitive slave, and belongs to the person who holds him in custody, that another judge has a right to question all this, and take upon himself alone to try his right to freedom, and discharge him? It is impossible. The writ of habeas corpus was never intended to give any such right.

This would give a judge the sole power of deciding the right of property the master claims in his slave, instead of trying that right by a jury, as prescribed by the Constitution. He would be judge of matters of law and matters of fact; clothed with all the powers of a jury as well as the powers of a court. Such a principle is unknown in your system of jurisprudence. Your Constitution has forbid it. It preserves the right of trial by jury in all cases where the value in controversy exceeds twenty dollars. The gentleman has said, if this bill should pass it will enable the Southern planters to take and carry away, not only their own fugitive slaves, but any other person of color, whether he be a free man or a slave. It would enable them to carry off a free white man, and even one of the members of this Senate. Sir, the gentleman from Rhode Island may consider himself as perfectly safe from any such hazard; for, however much we may respect our Northern friends as gentlemen, as lawyers, and as statesmen, we should have no sort of use for them in our cotton fields. Nor should we admire their political instructions to our slaves if they should carry with them their present impressions.

The honorable gentleman has spoken of the practice of the Southern people in kidnapping their free negroes, and calls them man stealers. And the gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. ROBERTS) has called them kidnappers, men stealers, and soul drivers; and he asks, in a very emphatic manner, who drew this bill, and upon what authority? Or if it was brought in upon the application of any of the abolition societies? And then he answers these questions himself, and says it was not, but that it had been drawn by a cunning lawyer, and was supported by lawyers. Sir, this language does not comport with the moderation which that gentleman expressed a desire should prevail in this discussion when he addressed the Senate on the subject early in this debate. Is this the language we are to meet when we are suing for our Constitutional rights? The Constitution of the United States has guaranteed to the master a right to pursue his fugitive slave, and has enjoined to the State to which he shall fly to deliver him up. It has not left it optional with the State to which he flies, but has made it imperative that he shall be delivered up. And has it come to this, that we must wait for the permission of the abolition societies before a law can be offered to secure the recovery of just rights? This was not more novel than strange.

Fugitive Slaves.

Mr. S. said, it had been a practice in monarchical governments to discredit lawyers, where they had often been foremost in checking a high-handed tyranny; but he had not expected to hear it practised in the Senate of the United States. The lawyers of this country had nothing to fear upon an investigation of their general character. They had been wanting in no public duty. During the Revolutionary war, as well as the late war, many of them had displayed as much gallantry in the field, and as much ability in the councils, as any men in the nation, whilst these abolition societies were in ease and security at home, following their domestic pursuits, and leaving it to others to fight their battles. Mr. S. said, he was sorry to make these remarks, but they were just, and were forced from him. He admired the moderation and virtue of these people; he thought them worthy of imitation in many respects, but he did not admire their constant efforts to alienate the affections of the people of color from their masters, with whom they lived happy, and by whom they were better provided for than the peasantry of any other country upon earth; or, indeed, in some portions of this country, if the facts given by their writers be correct. Mr. Melish, of Philadelphia, in an essay published only a few days ago, states, that there are in the city and county of Philadelphia at least fifteen thousand people, all able and willing to work, who are either idle or occupied in unproductive labor, and says, that melancholy picture pervades the country throughout. This place is the very centre of emancipation; and if unable to furnish employment for their own population, is there any reason why they should add to this picture of growing distress, by an accumulation of free negroes?

Notwithstanding all that has been said by our northern brethren against us for keeping slaves, they employ their free blacks in all their drudgery, and obtain their labor on better terms than masters do. And although it does not apply to that body generally, yet it is a fact, susceptible of proof, that some who profess to promote this principle of abolition, have seduced the slaves from the neighboring States under promises to secure their emancipation, instead of which they put them to work, and treat them with so much more severity and injustice than their masters, that the slaves either made it known where they were, or run away from these new tyrants and went back to their former state of slavery, as a better and more desirable condition.

With all this boast about freedom and emancipation, there are only four States that have no slaves. Even the magnificent State of Pennsylvania is a slaveholding State; so is the State of Rhode Island. Those which are non-slaveholding States, with the exception of Ohio, have not long since got rid of them. Rhode Island, New York, and Pennsylvania, previous to taking steps to abolish slavery, furnished the Southern markets with considerable numbers. And the very moment the African trade was opened in South Carolina, in the year 1803, these very States furnished their full proportion of shipping to carry it on. Even our friends in Boston, and other New England States, were willing to help with their shipping; besides, it furnished a market for their surplus rum. So we perceive, whenever interest is concerned, and a little profit is to be made, all this delicacy about slavery is laid aside.

Whilst it was their interest to hold slaves, so long they kept them. Whenever the interest coupled with it ceased, slavery ceased, but not before. After the war, trade revived, especially in the Eastern States; it was found that a negro capital must give way to a commercial capital; which was infinitely more profitable. So it is now with banking capital. Even in the States where slavery exists to the greatest extent; we find many selling off their negroes and vesting the proceeds in bank stock; and especially those who live in the towns and cities. This capital, being so much more profitable than the other, it is constantly increasing. And there are no persons more apt to remonstrate against that crying sin slavery, than such as have just sold off their stock of negroes, and vested the price in bank stock. Slavery, then, becomes very odious. They wish to see it abolished—they do not like to see this traffic in human flesh. But it is because they have got its precious price in a stock that will yield them a three or four-fold profit; not till then can they see its enormity. It is a very convenient thing to be receiving a large profit upon his stock, which is going on under the fostering hand of bank directors, whilst the owner is asleep or taking his pleasure. We have lately seen it published, that some banks have divided as much as thirty per cent. upon their capital, whilst the most successful planter will not receive more than ten, and, very many years, not half that amount. This banking system is what will form the ground-work for overthrowing this species of property, by gradually diminishing the number of its holders, and increasing the bank stock influence. Look how slavery has diminished in the public estimation, as the other system has grown. The States which have taken measures to abolish slavery, have become perfectly bank mad. New York has abolished slavery after ten years, and she is convulsed with banks, and not yet satisfied. There was a late attempt to establish one with a capital of six millions, but it was checked by the Executive. The State of Pennsylvania, already abounding in banks, incorporated forty-seven by one law—they climbed over the Executive veto to do so; two-thirds of the Senate, and about three-fourths of the House of Representatives supporting it. Many of these banks, without a farthing of capital, drawing a large income from the hard earnings of the honest and unwary part of the community, and absolutely refusing to redeem their paper, without one compunction for the misery and ruin it brings with it. When these very frauds were practising to an enormous degree, without a murmur, except from those who were sinking under it, the feelings of that country were bleeding for the supposed distress of the slaves of the South.

The famous article in the Treaty of Ghent, by which we have guaranteed to England our co-operation in abolishing the African slave trade, is worth notice. Our Commissioners, friendly to banks and opposed to slavery, had no instructions to enter into any such stipulation. Great Britain had not long before abolished that trade; and our Government had done so forty years before, by an ordinance of the First Congress, in 1774, and which had been rendered more complete by a law of 1807. It was totally unconnected with the subject of negotiation. We were at war upon other grounds entirely. Not even a question of commerce had ever arisen between the two nations upon it; yet it found its way, an isolated article, into a Treaty of Peace!

The Colonizing Society is another step in this grand scheme. This society intends to send the free negroes, and other persons of color, into the wilds of Africa; by which they are to be torn from the land of their nativity, and everything to which they are attached by friendship and habit, and the advantages of civilized life, and left to sink again into all the miserable barbarity of their ancestors. But it is said it will pave the way to a general emancipation.

We do by no means suppose that any honorable member of Congress would think of such a thing as a general emancipation; because, independently of interfering with private rights, they know too well that such a measure could not take place without involving the whole of the United States in an awful situation. But, that a general emancipation is intended there can be no doubt, by the Eastern and Northern States, if they can find means to effect it. The abolition societies are avowedly for it; what else can the very name itself indicate? Although their numerous petitions, now before Congress, purport to extend no further than to prevent kidnapping, yet, look at the language of the petitions. If they had applied directly for emancipation, they could not speak plainer. Connected with these petitions, now in the possession and under the consideration of Congress, is the resolution of the gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. BURRILL,) to inquire "into the expediency of the United States taking measures, in concert with other nations, for the entire abolition of said trade." As this resolution had been once before the Senate, and had been referred by a majority to a committee to report with what nations, and under what regulations we should connect ourselves to effect this project, Mr. S. said, it would not be out of the way to advert to it, and inquire what hopes we had of a fortunate result. With whom is this Government to connect itself in this desirable work? It would seem that it ought to be with nations whose general policy is favorable to emancipation, and whose subjects enjoy the blessings of civil liberty at home, before we could expect much beneficial aid from their co-operation. We are not to hope for this from Russia, Prussia, and Austria, whose subjects are borne down by the iron hand of tyranny. Their peasantry are bought and sold at home like slaves, and are suffered to be sent to this country and sold in our markets. Nor is it to be hoped for from England, if her policy should dictate to her a different course. She is now riding foremost in this career, because it promises to extend and promote her commercial interest, whilst her millions of paupers at home are dying in garrets, or falling by the way side, and if they assemble, to raise their cry to their rulers for bread, the riot act is read, and then the military is ordered to fire on them. Three of these nations, assisted by the ships of the other, have spread their sceptre over the destinies of Europe, and formed an holy league against its dawning liberties. These are the nations with whom you are to associate to abolish slavery. It is not to be wondered at, under all this influence, with a total want of knowledge of the comfortable condition of the slaves, that our northern neighbors should feel unfavorable to slavery. But most of the northern gentlemen, when they remove to the southward, and when they can see and judge for themselves, have no hesitation in buying slaves. General Greene, to whom the State of Georgia gave a plantation that cost five thousand guineas, and South Carolina ten thousand pounds sterling, for his services during the Revolutionary war, had no hesitation in purchasing a large gang of negroes to cultivate this plantation, notwithstanding he had been raised to the northward, and had been brought up a quaker.

But, there is another perpetual source of misrepresentation, which serves to place it in an odious light to strangers: it is the number of catch-penny prints and pamphlets that are published by persons who know no more of the condition of the slaves than they do of the man in the moon. Go to a bookstore, and you meet prints hung up in some conspicuous place, in large capital letters, "Portraiture of Domestic Slavery," published in Philadelphia; or the "Horrors of Slavery," published in Cambridge, and sold in Boston. These pamphlets contain all the extraordinary cases collected on the high seas, in the West Indies, or United States, together with such inflammatory speeches of travellers, who have no other means of giving to their writings interest, than by dealing in the marvellous; or of fanatic preachers, or speeches in the British Parliament, calculated to inflame without being able to instruct, and suited more to promote a particular policy than to promote the rights of humanity.

SENATE.

At the time the memorials of the several abolition societies were presented to the Senate, some unknown hand had laid on the desk of each Senator a pamphlet, entitled "The Horrors of Slavery, in two parts, by John Kenrick; sold in Boston, price twenty cents." This twenty-cent pamphlet gives many horrible pictures of slavery; and no doubt the author knew this great moving cause, the twenty cents, would multiply in proportion to the extravagance of his descriptions. This twenty-cent pamphleteer, amongst his other good offices, has pointed out Louisiana as a very fit place to colonize all the slaves, after they are emancipated, (which he seems to think a certain event,) and takes care not to lose sight of the fine market it would afford for their manufactures. Mr. S. said, if an emancipation should take place, he would rather see them settled in the Northern States, among their friends, where they could be better superintended. The people of the Southern States would by no means thank Mr. Kenrick for such neighbors; and more especially if they are to be educated like the free negroes in the Northern and Eastern States, if the account given by the gentleman from Connecticut (Mr. DAGGERT) be correct, of which we have no doubt. He says they have fifty white inhabitants for one black, and that there are three public crimes committed by the blacks where there is one committed by a white person. This will make the proportion one hundred and fifty to one. And, if we are to judge from the registers of their penitentiaries, we should believe they have their full share of crimes, even amongst their whites.

This same pamphleteer, after giving us the pious effusions of English travellers, Northern pamphleteers, American map-makers, and British members of Parliament, gives us a pathetic extract from the speech of the late Mr. Pitt, in the British House of Commons, upon the question for abolishing the African slave trade, which, sir, is worth reading. It is in the following words: "The present was not a mere question of feeling. The argument which ought, in his opinion, to determine the committee, was, that the slave trade was unjust. It was therefore such a trade as it was impossible for him to support, unless it could first be proved to him that there were no laws of morality binding on nations, and that it was not the duty of a Legislature to restrain its subjects from invading the happiness of other countries, and from violating the fundamental principles of justice." This, sir, was the language of Mr. Pitt, the celebrated orator and accomplished statesman, who decries the traffic, after his country has filled her colonial possessions with slaves, whilst there was yet an inch of ground for them to cultivate, and to check the growth of the colonies of other rival nations, and under whose policy every nation in Europe has been drenched in blood for twenty years; and who, at the very moment he was remonstrating so strongly against invading the happiness of other countries, and violating the fundamental principles of justice, was planning and carrying on a most cruel and desolating war in the distant regions of Asia—a war, not of defence, but a war purely for conquest—a war carried on by corrupting and exciting rival chiefs, and then holding out terms of friendship to the conqueror, who is made the tool of further treachery, and who falls, in his turn, a victim to the same perfidy; until England has reduced under her dominions more than seventy millions of people, who pay them tribute, and have no liberty left, but that of worshipping Juggernaut! At no time since the days of civilization has the happiness of other nations been more disturbed or injustice more practised towards them than during the administration of Mr. Pitt. When the sources of our admonitions shall become more pure, we shall no doubt allow them more weight.

But, we are told by these pamphlet writers, that slavery is "a violation of the Divine laws." And the gentleman from New York, (Mr. KING,) in discussing this subject, has told us, "it is contrary to our holy religion." And the gentleman from New Hampshire (Mr. MORRIL) has told us, that in New England, they believe "all men are born equally free and independent;" that "every human affection recoils at their bondage." The gentleman has said, "the Bible is our moral guide;" and says it was for dealing "in gold and silver and precious stones and pearls and chariots and slaves and souls of men, that produced the downfall of the great Babylon." And he seems to think, that, unless we abolish slavery, we shall provoke the wrath of Heaven, and that we shall go next. The gentleman has forgot one of the great offences of that people: it was for taking of usury. The same Bible which he has adopted for his moral guide says: "Take thou no usury of him, or increase; but fear thy God." This part of the Bible must have become obsolete in New England since the introduction of banks. It must now be pleasing in the sight of Heaven to see a dividend as large as twenty per cent. to each bank share. There are as many chariots, as many pearls, as much gold and silver, perhaps, in New England, as there was in Babylon, at the time of its fall; yet they are in no danger till the vengeance of Heaven has fallen on the slaveholding States first, the gentleman seems to think.

Upon this great question, sir, notwithstanding the opinion of honorable gentlemen to the contrary, there have been some very respectable opinions as to the Divine authority in favor of slavery. We all know that Ham sinned against his God and against his father, for which Noah the inspired patriarch cursed Canaan the son of Ham, and said, "A servant of servants shall he be unto his brethren." Newton, who was perhaps as great a divine as any in New England, and as profound a scholar, in a book of great celebrity called his Prophecies, in which he endeavors to prove the divinity of the Bible by the many prophecies that are now fulfilling, says that this very African race are the descendants of Canaan, and have been the slaves of many nations, and are still expiating in bondage the curse upon themselves and their progenitors. But it may be said that this is only an opinion of Mr. Newton, and that we can see no reason in it. Mr. S. said, if the gentleman was unwilling to believe Mr. Newton, he would surely believe Moses and the prophets. And if the Senate would indulge him, he would show from the Bible itself that slavery was permitted by Divine authority; and for that purpose he would open to the xxvth chapter of Leviticus, and read as follows: "And the Lord spake unto Moses in Mount Sinai, saying, Speak unto the children of Israel, and say unto them," &c. "39. And if thy brother that dwelleth by thee be waxen poor, and be sold unto thee; thou shalt not compel him to serve as a bond-servant: 40. But as an hired servant, and as a sojourner, he shall be with thee, and shall serve thee unto the year of jubilee." "44. Both thy bond-men and thy bond-maids, which thou shalt have, shall be of the heathen that are round about you: and of them shall ye buy bond-men and bond-maids. 45. Moreover, of the children of the strangers that do sojourn among you, of them shall ye buy, and of their families that are with you, which they begat in your land: and they shall be your possession: 46. And ye shall take them as an inheritance for your children after you, to inherit them for a possession; they shall be your bond-men for ever," &c.

This, Mr. President, is the word of God, as given to us in the Holy Bible, delivered by the Lord himself to his chosen servant Moses. It might be hoped this would satisfy the scruples of all who believe in the divinity of the Bible; as the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire certainly does, as he has referred to that sacred volume for his creed. It might satisfy the scruples of Mr. Kenrick, and the divines who appear so shocked at seeing a father dispose of his slaves to his children by his last will and testament, as they will perceive the scriptures direct them to go as an inheritance. The honorable gentleman says, he speaks not only his own, but the universal sentiments of all those he represents. If he and his friends of New Hampshire have not turned aside after strange gods, it is hoped the authority I have quoted might satisfy them.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, March 9.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the memorial of Thomas Tenant and George Stiles, of the city of Baltimore, merchants, made a report thereon; which was read, and the memorial, together with the report thereon, were ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was recommended the bill regulating the pay and emoluments of brevet officers, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. DAGGETT, from the joint committee, to whom was referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 3d of March instant, on the subject of the adjournment of Congress, reported a resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of the first session of the fifteenth Congress.

The resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, presented the petition of Benjamin S. Smoot and others, praying to be confirmed in their title to a tract of land including the town of St. Stephens, in the Alabama Territory; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON presented the petition of Henrietta Ross, widow and relict of the deceased Colonel George T. Ross, praying relief in consideration of the services of her late husband; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Pensions.

The PRESIDENT communicated the petition of Asael Clark, a citizen of New York, praying indemnity for a judgment obtained against him for a certain sum of money received by him as judge advocate of a general court martial organized for the trial of militia delinquents in the year 1812, by the then Governor of the State of New York, by order of General Dearborn, the money so received having been paid over to Samuel Edmonds, paymaster general; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Gamble, made a report, accompanied with a resolution, that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition. The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of Cata Bunnell; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

On motion, by Mr. ROBERTS, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the authentication of patents for land in such manner as that the signature of the President of the United States may not be necessary.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the support of the Navy of the United States for the year 1818;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to a third reading. The said bill was read a third time by unanimous consent, and passed.

Mr. SMITH presented the petition of William Marshall, of the city of Charleston, praying to be relieved from the payment of certain judgments obtained against him, as collector for moneys not collected; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to their amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army;" and the 1st, 2d, 4th, 5th, and 6th amendments having been agreed to; and, on the question to concur in the 3d amendment as follows—"lines 2d and 3d, strike out the

YEAS—Messrs. Burrill, Campbell, Crittenden, Daggett, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Morrill, Otis, Sanford, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Dickerson, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Smith, and Storer.

So it was Resolved, That the Senate concur in the amendments of the House of Representatives to their amendments to the said bill.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of John Hall, late a Major in the Marine Corps of the United States, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted. The report and resolution were read.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom were referred the memorial of certain commissioned officers of the Navy, under the rank of commanders, and also the memorial of certain officers of the Marine Corps attached to the Mediterranean squadron; and, on motion, by Mr. TAIT, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims to whom were referred sundry memorials and petitions for indemnification for French spoliation; and, on motion, by Mr. BURRILL, the consideration thereof was further postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Weaver Bennet; and in concurrence therewith, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Davis; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the claim of the petitioner ought not to be allowed.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Thomas Wright; and, in concurrence therewith, the said Thomas Wright had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to reduce the staff of the Army; and the bill having been amended, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in conformity with the provisions of the act of Congress of the 3d of March, 1817, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to certain banks in the District of Columbia, and to prevent the circulation of the notes of incorporated associations within the said District," in relation to the situation of the said banks respectively, on the 1st day of January, 1818; which was read.

The engrossed resolution, proposing an amendment to the Constitution of the United States, as it respects the election of Representatives in Congress, and the appointment of Electors of President and Vice President of the United States, was read a third time; and, on the question, "Shall this resolution pass?" it was determined in the negative—years 20, days 13; two-thirds of the Senators present not agreeing thereto—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burrill, Campbell, Crittenden, Dickerson, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Hunter, Johnson, King, Lacock, Macon, Morrow, Noble, Smith, Stokes, Talbot, Tichenor, Williams of Massachusetts, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Daggett, Eppes, Horsey, Leake, Morrill, Otis, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Taylor, and Van Dyke.

The PRESIDENT also communicated the memorial of the Legislature of the Alabama Territory, remonstrating against the prayer of the memorial of the Mississippi Convention, praying an extension of the limits of that State; and the memorial was read, and referred to the committee to whom was referred on the 16th December, 1817, the said memorial of the Mississippi Convention, to consider and report thereon, by bill or otherwise.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill entitled "An act altering the time for holding a session of the district court in the District of Maine;" also a bill, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the circuit court, in the southern district of New York, and for other purposes;" and also a resolution fixing the time for the adjournment of the first session of the fifteenth Congress, in which bills and resolution they request the concurrence of the Senate.

FUGITIVE SLAVES.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for delivering up persons held to labor or service in any of the States or Territories, who shall escape into any other State or Territory."

Mr. MORRILL addressed the Chair as follows:

Mr. President, I think it correct and proper for any gentleman who is not in favor of the bill, to present his objections on the second reading, that its friends may have a fair opportunity to amend it. Under these impressions, I make a motion for a recommitment, that any imperfections may be properly laid before the Senate.

I am not insensible, sir, of the peculiar disadvantages under which I address you on the bill upon your table. I am extremely depressed with an apprehension of unfavorable impressions, which may have been erroneously made, on the minds of honorable gentlemen from the South, in consequence of remarks which fell from me on another occasion, upon a subject not altogether foreign from this. Sentiments which originated in the purest motives, and, in my opinion, in perfect coincidence with the spirit of our Constitution;

SENATE.

Fugitive Slaves.

MARCH, 1818.

I may, therefore, be allowed this opportunity peremptorily to disclaim any hostility to the provisions of the Constitution respecting slavery; or to any law founded upon the principles and in accordance with such provisions. Sir, I wish it to be distinctly understood, that I have no disposition to deprive slaveholders of that species of property; to aid their slaves in escaping; to detain them when they have escaped; or to impede their exertions in recovering them in a Constitutional and legal manner, without endangering the rights, or infringing the privileges of free citizens.

I very readily acknowledge, that there are provisions in the Constitution which recognise slavery—which I consider a kind of compact by compromise, into which the States mutually entered when they adopted that instrument, about which I have neither a right nor disposition to complain. I hold it, sir, as sacredly binding as any part of this palladium of our rights, and to prevent its due operation is not the wish of my heart; at the same time, I am far from being the advocate or friend of slavery. If I were to be governed by my own personal feelings, independent of any other control, or were I to be guided by my views of the principles of the common law, I should assuredly say, no slavery. But, sir, in my present situation, I deem it my duty to divest myself of all prepossessions and partialities, and, as a legislator, to be directed by the express provisions of the Constitution—the glory of our country, and the admiration of the world.

In investigating this subject, I shall studiously endeavor to avoid any expression which may intentionally implicate the views of the honorable gentlemen, with whom it is my pride to act; and with equal solicitude to avoid such digression from the point, as again to discompose the feelings of the venerable gentleman from New York. But, sir, should I so far, inadvertently, diverge from the lex parliamentaria, as to introduce the debates of the other House, I assure you I will not complain if that honorable gentleman should call me to order.

Previous to my adverting to the provisions and details of this bill, it was my intention to make a few observations upon the law now in force upon this subject; the existence of which, in my view, renders the passing of this altogether unnecessary. But, as my remarks have been anticipated by the honorable gentleman from Rhode Island, (Mr. BURRILL,) I shall very concisely observe, that law provides "that when any person held to labor in any of the States or Territories, under the laws thereof, shall escape into any other State or Territory, the person to whom such labor or service may be due, his agent or attorney, is empowered to seize or arrest such fugitive from labor, and to take him or her before any judge of the circuit or district courts of the United States, residing or being within the State, or before any magistrate of a county, city, or town corporate, wherein such seizure or arrest shall be made; and upon proof, to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate, either by oral testimony or affidavit, taken before and certified by a magistrate of any such State or Territory, that the person arrested doth, under the laws of the State or Territory from which he or she fled, owe service or labor to the person claiming him or her, it shall be the duty of such judge or magistrate to give a certificate thereof to such claimant, his agent or attorney, which shall be a sufficient warrant for removing the said fugitive from labor to the State or Territory from which he or she fled."

In this section of the law, sir, I conceive every provision is made for the speedy recovery of fugitive slaves, that gentlemen can rationally expect or reasonably desire. They have nothing more to do than seize the fugitive, and apply, by themselves or agent, to a judge or magistrate, and prove, to his satisfaction, by oral testimony or affidavit, that the person so seized has fled, and does owe labor or service to the claimant, and the judge or magistrate shall issue his certificate, which shall be sufficient for removing such fugitive to the place from which he or she absconded. This is a concise, plain, and easy course. But, sir, permit me now to examine the bill under our immediate consideration.

The provisions and details of this bill, in my humble opinion, are very deficient, imperfect, and improper. The first section provides "that when any person held to labor, &c., shall escape, &c., the person to whom such labor may be due, or his agent, may apply to any judge of the district or circuit court, &c., or to any judge, or two justices of a court of record, of the State or Territory from whence such fugitive shall have escaped; and upon proof to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrates that such fugitive is a slave, &c., and does owe labor to the person claiming him, and shall become bound in a recognisance, &c., to perform certain acts, then, and in that case, it shall be the duty of such judge of the district or circuit court, or such judge or magistrates of the State or Territory from whence such fugitive shall have escaped, to award a certificate, stating the place of abode of such claimant, and setting forth the name, age, and sex of such fugitive. This certificate shall be verified by the signature of the judge or justice awarding the same, and by the certificate of the clerk, under the seal of his court, (if there be a seal,) that the person signing the certificate first mentioned is a judge or justice of the description required by this act." The second section provides "that on producing such certificate as aforesaid, to any judge of the circuit or district court, or judge or justice of a court of record in the State or Territory to which such fugitive shall have escaped, it shall be the duty of such judge or magistrate to grant a warrant, authorizing any marshal, sheriff, sergeant, constable, or public bailiff of the State or Territory last aforesaid, to apprehend such fugitive, and bring him before such judge or justice. And if it shall thereupon appear to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate, by the oath of one or more credible witnesses, who shall, upon their own knowledge, swear to the identity of such fugitive, (the owner or claimant being, for this purpose, deemed a competent witness) or by the voluntary confession of such fugitive, that the person so apprehended hath escaped from the State wherein the said certificate was granted, and is the same person named in the said certificate, the said judge or justice shall deliver such person to the owner or his agent, with his certificate thereof, or, at the request of such owner or agent, shall issue his warrant, requiring any marshal, sheriff, sergeant, constable, or public bailiff, of such State or Territory, to take charge of such fugitive, and deliver him to the said claimant, &c., on the confines of the State or Territory last aforesaid;" and, by the same process, he shall be conducted to the place from which he absconded.

The most prominent exception which I shall note in the first section respects the character of the officers to be employed to take cognizance of a crime, and aid in carrying into effect the provisions of this bill. In this case, it is made the duty of two magistrates to take the testimony, that such fugitive, being very imperfectly described, is a slave, to award a certificate of this fact, to be verified and certified as therein directed. Here, sir, you call upon a State officer, under the State government, to perform a judicial act authorized by a law of the United States. Upon the services of this officer you have no claim; to demand them you have no power. This certificate, which is the foundation of a warrant, is granted without oath or affirmation, on a mere representation of the case.

By the second section, on producing this certificate, you make it the imperative duty of a justice of the peace to grant a warrant, authorizing a sheriff or constable (as he may please) to apprehend such fugitive, as therein imperfectly described, and bring him before such justice for examination. In this instance, you give as much validity to this certificate of a justice, granted in a distant State or Territory, as is given to a judgment obtained by a solemn decision of the Supreme Court of any State in the Union in any other State. In obtaining judgments or judicial decisions in civil actions you require witnesses upon oath; but here, where the liberty and rights of the citizen may be depending, you require none. Judgments out of the State where they are obtained, are considered no more than prima facie evidence of a debt; but in this respect the certificate is made stronger evidence of a fact. Here, contrary to all the ordinary rules in criminal prosecutions, you oblige a justice of the peace to issue his warrant to apprehend a person, without requiring the applicant to give oath or affirmation of the existence of a crime, or of the ground of suspicion. You require him to perform a judicial act, which may seriously and very materially affect the rights of the citizen, whose jurisdiction in civil actions is restricted to thirteen dollars thirty-three cents, and in criminal to six dollars sixty-six cents, by the constitution and laws of the State which gave him judicial existence. These remarks, however, particularly apply to the State of New Hampshire. By the same section, you require and oblige (or subject to a fine) a constable or sheriff to perform an act under a law of the United States, which exposes and puts in jeopardy the freedom of the citizen, the most valuable privilege he can enjoy or possess here on earth.

The constable, under the laws of the State which are to direct his conduct, is not empowered to serve a precept where the sum demanded exceeds thirteen dollars thirty-three cents. He is chosen by a town, without a commission or responsibility, many times little informed, and generally unacquainted with your laws and the duties required under them. If a sheriff is employed, he is a county officer, appointed by the Governor and Council for five years, and knows no other duties than such as are pointed out to him by the laws of the State in which he lives, and particularly relate to his official conduct within the limits of the county in which he resides.

What is this officer directed to do? To arrest a fugitive upon a warrant, founded upon a certificate illegal in its origin and imperfect in its structure. The only description given of the fugitive by which the officer is to identify and be governed in making the arrests is, "name, age, and sex," which, in fact, is no description. There is neither color, size, nor any other marks required to be given, by which the officer can identify the person, or safely make an arrest.

Here, Mr. President, is a simple statement of facts, as they arise in examining this bill. I shall venture to say, the course here directed is improper. Nay, more: the United States cannot constitutionally demand, or employ, the agency of any other power than its own, to discharge duties and perform services, under criminal laws emanating from Congress. The Constitution of the United States expressly says, "The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made, or which shall be made, under their authority."

By this process of the Constitution, we may distinctly see where the judicial power of the United States is deposited—that the laws of the United States are to be explained and enforced only by officers created by the constituted authorities of the United States. Are State and county judges, and justices of the peace, officers made under the Government of the United States? If they are, they are so made by a law of Congress. Will it be pretended that Congress have authority, by a legislative act, to prescribe the duty, create the office and the officer, ordain and establish the court and the judge? The doctrine is preposterous; it is too absurd to be admitted for a moment; it would be an assumption of power inconsistent in its nature and dangerous in its consequences. A part of this duty is confided to another branch of the Government by the express provisions of the Constitution and immemorial usage. The Government of the United States is composed of three distinct branches—each of which has duties to perform—the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial. They are designed to be kept as distinct and independent of each other as the nature of a free Government will admit. It is the province of the Legislature to make laws, not judges. You have lately passed a law dividing the State of Pennsylvania into two districts, by which a new court is created, but you have not created the judges. To do this by law would have been too manifest a violation of legislative power to be countenanced in this House. These State and county officers are not officers of this Government, and Congress have no claims upon their services as such. It is the duty of the Executive department to appoint officers. For this important feature in the structure of our Government there are many cogent reasons. The law, and the execution of the law, should always emanate from different sources. This is a fundamental principle in a republican Government. And when this principle is abandoned, one of the great barriers to the encroachments of power is annihilated—usurpation is the natural result, and collision must be the unavoidable consequence. It is the business of the judicial power to expound and execute the laws. For these duties the courts are qualified by their previous education and application to the general and particular principles of jurisprudence.

The extent of the several powers and duties of these respective branches of the Government are distinctly prescribed by the Constitution. Each has an orbit in which it may safely revolve, and, while it keeps within its own sphere, no danger will result from its legitimate action; but, when permitted to diverge, collision, confusion, and destruction are the inevitable consequences. It is not sufficient that an agent, who performs an act for the United States, be an officer of the United States; it must also appear that his authority to perform that act is derived from a legitimate source, otherwise the act is void. For an officer, in the District of Columbia, to apprehend a person, by virtue of a law of Virginia, would be an illegal arrest, and, of course, void. We may reverse the position. It is not competent for an officer, who executes a law of the General Government, to show that there is such a law; but, that he derived his office from the constituted authority of the United States. Apply this to the State or county officer whom you employ. A warrant, an arrest, a commitment, or trial, presupposes authority, power, and jurisdiction. The granting of a warrant, presupposes authority. To arrest, presupposes power. To commit or try, presupposes jurisdiction.

From what source does the county justice receive authority to arrest a person under a law of the United States? Surely not from the State, from the United States. You give him no authority—you cannot. The laws of the General Government do not make him a judicial officer, nor invest him with judicial power. He possesses powers for certain purposes, to be exercised according to the Constitution and laws of that independent sovereignty from whom he derived all his authority.

On this view of the subject, sir, I am led to the conclusion that Congress has no Constitutional power to authorize an officer, under a State government, to perform a judicial act. As false premises give rise to incorrect conclusions, it may be proper for me distinctly to state and define my view of judicial power and a judicial act. Sound premises render sophistical reasoning unnecessary, and present the force of an argument in a convincing point of view. By judicial power, I understand Constitutional and "legal authority" and discretion to adjudicate on any matter, "which is, in some form or way, the subject of litigation and controversy; and he who exercises such authority and discretion, performs a judicial act." To declare what shall be a rule, or make a law, is an act of legislation; but to apply the law to the case, is a judicial act. Judicial discretion extends only to the application of the rules of law to the facts and circumstances of each case. And this discretionary power of applying the rules of law to the variety of cases which may be presented for adjudication carries with it other incidental powers, as the right to judge of the competency, pertinency, and credibility of evidence. If these positions are correct, it needs no argument to show, that, under the provisions of this bill, the judge or justice exercises judicial power in every instance in which he is authorized to act. On the application of the owner of a fugitive, or his agent, the judge or justice is to decide, in view of the testimony presented, whether he is a slave, and does owe service or labor to the claimant, according to the laws of the State or Territory from which such fugitive may have escaped. This being decided in the affirmative, the claimant, or his agent, enters into a recognisance, on certain conditions, to perform certain acts. In consequence of which the judge or justice grants his certificate, setting forth the name, age, and sex, of such fugitive, which certificate shall be verified by the signature of the person who grants it, and shall be certified by a clerk of a court that such officer is a judge or justice of the description required by this act.

This, sir, I consider a judicial act—not because giving a certificate of a fact is a judicial act, but because the certificate has, in its ultimate operation, the very nature of a warrant. The efficacy given to it, by the provisions of this bill, entirely changes it from the original character of a simple certificate, and makes it a sufficient warrant for a specific judicial act. On presenting this certificate to a judge or justice, in a State or Territory to which the fugitive may have escaped, it is made ample authority for him, nay, you declare it is his "duty to grant a warrant, authorizing a sheriff or constable to apprehend such fugitive and bring him before such magistrate; and if it shall thereupon appear to the satisfaction of such judge or magistrate," by the testimony then produced, "that the person so apprehended has escaped, &c., the said judge or justice shall 'deliver such person to the owner, or his agent, with his certificate thereof, or, at the request of such owner, or agent, shall issue his warrant requiring any sheriff, &c., to take charge and custody of such fugitive, and deliver him," &c. If it shall here appear, on examination, by the testimony offered, that the person named in the certificate, and arrested, is a fugitive, the justice shall deliver him to the claimant, or issue his warrant, and commit him to the custody of an officer. In these instances, I presume, no one will contend that the justice does not perform judicial acts. If it is possible for a magistrate to exercise judicial power, it must be in the performance of the duties above enjoined.

It is not only in granting a warrant, but in determining on the competency of the testimony, and the legality of the duty performed, that this judicial power is exercised; it is the province of a judicial officer to judge of the propriety and exercise the power of issuing a warrant to arrest a person. This, I presume, is a principle universally admitted. "To judge of the grounds of an accusation, on which a warrant to arrest may or may not be issued, is as really a judicial act as the process of trial and condemnation." Neither names of office, forms of evidence, nor degree of criminality have any essential weight in determining the abstract nature and character of judicial power. This capacity to exercise the judgment, in view of testimony, for the purpose of removing doubts, obviating objections, and deciding on matters which are affirmed on the one part and presumed to be denied on the other, is always accompanied with a confidence of trust, the exercise of which, even in the incipient act of a justice of the peace, in granting a warrant to arrest a person, is an exercise of judicial power. This view of the subject perfectly coincides with the opinion of the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, in the case of Judge Laurence. (3 Dallas's, rep. 53.) During the consular convention with France, Judge Laurence, being district judge of the United States, for the district of New York, was required by the vice consul of the French Republic to issue a warrant to apprehend Captain Barre, commander of a frigate, then lying in the harbor, belonging to the French Republic, as a deserter. The judge deemed it necessary, to justify him in granting a warrant, that the consul should prove by the roll of the ship that Captain Barre was one of the crew of the said frigate. The consul proposed other evidence, but the judge considered this indispensable; in consequence of which, application was made to the Supreme Court for a mandamus to compel the judge to issue a warrant. The court, on deliberation, decided the case and refused the mandamus; and, in assigning their reasons and expressing their opinion, say "it is evident that the district judge was acting in a judicial capacity, when he determined that the evidence was not sufficient to authorize his issuing a warrant." Hence, I conclude, that granting a warrant by a justice of the peace is one of those preparatory judicial acts which is a portion of that judicial power which forms one of the great branches of our Government; and, being such, it can be performed under a law of the United States only, by a judge or justice of the United States, and not by any State or county judge or justice, as such. Were we to examine the principles of the common law on this subject, we should find that granting a warrant in that sense is a judicial act. But, notwithstanding all these Constitutional and legal embarrassments, you call upon the justice and enjoin it upon him to issue his warrant upon the certificate presented by the claimant or his agent. It will be natural for the justice to examine this instrument previous to his acting under it as competent authority; and, on this examination, will he not pause a moment? What is the pretended description given of the person to be apprehended? Only "name, age, sex"—not even stature nor color—which may be justly considered no description. But, further, will not the justice be led to inquire into the legality of this act and the propriety of his performing it? He is not an officer of the United States. From whom does he derive his authority to act in a judicial capacity? To whom is he accountable? What is to govern his conduct? As before observed, considering him a justice of the peace in the State of New Hampshire, he will have recourse to the constitution and laws of that State. This Constitutional instruction will be thus expressed: "No subject shall be held to answer for any crime or offence until the same is fully and plainly, substantially and formally described to him, or compelled to accuse or furnish evidence against himself; and every subject shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favorable to himself, to meet the witnesses face to face, and to be fully heard in his defence by himself and counsel. And no subject shall be arrested, imprisoned, despoiled, or deprived of his property, immunities, or privileges, put out of the protection of the law, exiled or deprived of his life, liberty, or estate, but by the judgment of his peers or the law of the land. Every subject has a right to be secure from all unreasonable searches and seizures of his person, his houses, his papers, and all his possessions. Therefore, all warrants to search suspected places or arrest a person for examination or trial, in prosecutions for criminal matters, are contrary to this right, if the cause or foundation of them be not previously supported by oath or affirmation; and if the order in a warrant to a civil officer to make search in suspected places, or to arrest one or more suspected persons, or to seize their property, be not accompanied with a special designation of the persons or objects of search, arrest, or seizure; and no warrant ought to be issued but in cases with the formalities prescribed by law."

By this fundamental law of the State, we distinctly see that no warrant can be issued to arrest a person unless supported by oath or affirmation, with a special designation of the person to be apprehended. But neither of these is rendered essential by the bill now under consideration, as has been clearly shown, which I consider a very material defect that ought to be remedied by amendment.

The sentiments of Blackstone on this subject are in perfect unison with those which have been already advanced: "We are now," says Blackstone, Com. 289, 90, "to consider the regular and ordinary method of proceeding in the courts of criminal jurisdiction, which may be distributed under twelve general heads, following each other in progressive order, viz: 1, arrest; 2, commitment and bail; 3, prosecution; 4, process," &c. And, speaking of the arrest, he says "a justice of the peace hath power to issue a warrant to apprehend a person accused of felony, though not yet indicted; and he may also issue a warrant to apprehend a person suspected of felony, though the original suspicion be not in himself, but in the party who prays his warrant; because he is a competent judge of the probability offered to him of such suspicion. But in both cases it is fitting to examine, upon oath, the party requiring a warrant, as well to ascertain that there is a felony or other crime committed, without which no warrant should be granted, as also to prove the cause and probability of suspecting the party against whom the warrant is prayed." The prohibitions of the constitution of the State, and the essential prerequisites laid down by Blackstone, would seem amply sufficient to deter the reflecting magistrate from issuing his warrant to arrest a person, with all the imperfections justified by the provisions of this bill. But, when we recur to the express provisions of the Constitution of the United States, the only instrument which can give legitimacy to this bill, and find its details materially deficient, and, in some respects, directly prohibited, I conceive any further illustrations or arguments would be needless. Fourth article of the amendments—"the right of the people to be secure in their persons, houses, papers, and effects, against unreasonable searches and seizures, shall not be violated; and no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation, and particularly describing the place to be searched, and the persons or things to be seized." The perspicuity of this article in the Constitution is too clear to receive any additional light by comment; it is too definite to be misapprehended; it is too obligatory to be resisted or evaded.

Mr. President, I observed that Congress have no Constitutional power to authorize officers, commissioned by State Governments, to perform judicial duties under the criminal laws of the United States. Perhaps a moment's attention to the declarations of the Constitution on this subject, may place this position in a clearer point of view. Art. 3. sec. 1, "the judicial power of the United States shall be vested in one Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as the Congress may, from time to time, ordain and establish." Art. 1, sec. 8, "the Congress shall have power to constitute tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court," and,

Art. 3, sec. 2, "the judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity, arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and the treaties made or which shall be made, under their authority." These specific declarations define the origin and the extent of the judicial power of the United States, in the most concise and conclusive manner. It distinctly shows from what source this power shall originate; where it shall be deposited; and how far, and to what cases it shall extend. Compare these with that part of the Constitution which defines Executive power. Art. 2, sec. 1, "the Executive power shall be vested in a President of the United States of America." But, however, "in case of the removal of the President from office, or of his death, resignation or inability to discharge the powers and duties of the said office, the same shall devolve on the Vice President, and the Congress may, by law, provide for the case of removal, death, resignation, or inability, both of the President and Vice President, declaring what officer shall then act as President, and such officer shall act accordingly, until the disability be removed, or a President shall be elected." Sir, I do not hesitate to say, Congress are not competent to vest this power in any other officer, while the President lives and holds the office. But why? Because this provision of the Constitution is definite and express—but no more than that which respects the other branch of the Government. The language is perfectly similar. "The judicial power shall be vested," &c., "the Executive power shall be vested," &c. From these express provisions, and positive prohibitions of the Constitution, the power of Congress is defined, in establishing courts of law, and the authority of the courts regulated in the performance of duty.

And it seems to follow, as an inevitable consequence, that Congress have no power nor right to prescribe where the judicial authority shall or shall not vest—they are not competent to say it shall not vest in a supreme and inferior court. No, they may constitute inferior courts, and distribute, and regulate judicial authority among the courts, as provided by the Constitution, but they have no right to invest such power in any manner whatever, differently from that which is explicitly prescribed by the Constitution.

Now, then, a question arises; do the provisions of this bill, requiring and commanding the performance of judicial duties, by State or county officers, ordain and establish an inferior court agreeably to the provisions of the Constitution? This, I presume, will not be pretended. Then the unavoidable result is, that officers commissioned by a State government, should they perform services under the laws of the United States, they are not United States officers; but are officers of courts of the State from which they received their commissions. If they are not transformed, from an officer or court of a State, to an officer or court of the United States, by a legislative act of Congress, then they have no authority to explain or enforce laws emanating from that source. In confirmation of these positions, I must again have recourse to the opinion of the Supreme Court of the United States, Martin vs Hunter's Lessee, 1, Wheaton 334. "In all cases arising under the Constitution, laws, and treaties of the United States, the State courts could not ordinarily, (that is, under the old confederation) possess a direct jurisdiction. Jurisdiction over such cases could not exist in State courts previous to the adoption of the Constitution, and could not afterwards be directly conferred on them; for the Constitution expressly requires the judicial power to be vested in courts ordained and established by the United States."

This opinion has been expressed in strong terms by the supreme courts of several of the principal States in the Union: viz. Ohio, Maryland, Pennsylvania, Virginia, and, I think, New York. No, sir, the transfer of this power to State or county officers cannot be done, it never ought to be done. The United States are an independent sovereignty, entirely distinct from the several State Governments. And each State is an independent sovereignty, as really so, as that of France and England. Hence the United States have no authority to enforce the laws of individual States; nor individual States the laws of other States, or those of the United States. I imagine it is a principle, established by all governments, that the expounding and enforcing of the penal laws of an independent State belongs exclusively to such State. The English courts adhere so rigidly to this salutary principle, that they will not enforce the revenue laws, nor any part of the penal code of any foreign State. The same principle has been scrupulously observed on the Continent of Europe. Even the several States which formerly composed the seven United Provinces, uniformly maintained this important doctrine; whose principles of government were more analogous to ours than those of any other nation whatever. In no instance would one Province presume to expound and enforce the penal laws of another. And we are taught, sir, from very high authority, that this principle has been applied, and extended in some instances to civil causes, as in the case of Gason vs. Wordsworth, 2, Vesey, 336, where a commission to take testimony being sent from the court of chancery of England to Sweden, the King of Sweden refused to execute the commission; requiring it to be done by some magistrate in Sweden, according to the laws of his Kingdom.

Something not altogether dissimilar to this took place in the State of Maryland, in the case of McKean vs. Bruff; a bill of discovery was filed in the chancery court of Maryland, stating that the defendant had knowledge of certain facts, to which he might depose, as material evidence for the plaintiff in a cause depending in Virginia; and therefore prayed that the defendant might be compelled to make affidavit of those facts, to be used in evidence in a suit depending in Virginia. To which bill the defendant demurred; and although the claim to the relief was pressed with great ability and argument, by Mr. Breckenridge, the plaintiff's counsel, the Chancellor sustained the demurrer, on the ground that the court had no power to compel a witness to give evidence under such circumstances. The fourth article second section of the Constitution, which defines the mode in which a fugitive from justice in one State may be apprehended in another, and remanded for trial to the State whose criminal code had been violated, is a virtual recognition of this general rule, as to criminal cases. Hence, it seems very clear, that this general principle, that one State will not expound and enforce the criminal laws of another, admits of no exception. And, I believe, no State in this Union has violated the general principle, and I conclude they will not. But, here, sir, you command an individual, without any commission or compensation from your Government, to expound and enforce a law of the United States.

But, sir, permit me to take another view of the subject. It is not expedient for the United States to call on State and county officers, under State governments, to perform any duty under the criminal laws of Congress. It is much more suitable, correct, and proper, to empower only the officers of the General Government to execute its laws. It may justly be considered a perversion of the Constitution of the United States, and extremely dangerous, to commit power into the hands of those who are no way officially responsible; and, also, very unjust to exact service without compensation; especially, in many instances, where the State constitution and laws peremptorily prohibit the performance of such official acts with the informalities allowed by the provisions of this bill. With the officers of the United States it is otherwise. They derive their appointment and official existence from your Government, to be employed in your service in the execution of your laws; they are compensated by the General Government, responsible to it, removable and punishable by it, and upon their services you have just claims. But this connexion and mutual obligation between the Government of the United States and individual State and county officers does not, and cannot, exist. They derive their official existence and power from the government of the State in which they reside. The constitution and laws of their State define and regulate their power and duties; the extent of their jurisdiction in civil and criminal causes, and the tenure of their offices. They are commissioned to perform services for the State; they are compensated by the State; they are amenable to the State; they are removable and punishable by the State, and by that only.

Sir, allow me to present another difficulty. The tendency of this principle, if permitted by the States, and carried into general operation, is to derange and confuse the State authorities throughout the Union. If you can reasonably and justly demand the service of one State, or county officer, you may of two—there is no end to the demand. You certainly may, by parity of reasoning, use State and county courts, and officers, as agents to hear, try, and condemn, for any criminal violation of your laws. No distinction can be made—State and county courts may be destroyed. For, if the State tribunals can be invested with the jurisdiction, constitutionally, and expressly vested in the judicial officers of the United States, and the numerous, various, and complicated powers and duties of both combined, and invested in the same officer, it is very obvious that, in many instances, conflicting interests would ensue, and it might be extremely difficult, if not impossible, to determine what course might be the most eligible and correct to pursue. Sir, on recurring to the sixth section of this bill, another serious evil presents itself. You call upon a sheriff to perform a service, for which his commission gives him no authority; and you fine him five hundred dollars if he refuse or neglect. If he perform the service, he may be liable to indictment and imprisonment, and, if he neglect the service, he is liable to a fine of five hundred dollars. This liability, in part, arises from the extreme imperfection of the description required by this bill. Nothing but "name, age, and sex." I will illustrate this suggestion by an example: Suppose a person applies to a justice in the extreme part of the county of Rockingham, in New Hampshire, for a warrant to apprehend a fugitive in Portsmouth? The sheriff is governed entirely by the directions in the precept, and the instructions of the agent. He, under the direction of the agent, seizes a person as a fugitive, and conducts him to the justice who issued the warrant. Here he is identified by the agent, delivered over to him, and conducted to Georgia. But, in consequence of the imperfection of the description, the ignorance or design of the agent, on examination in Georgia, he proves not to be the fugitive intended by the certificate. He is therefore discharged, and returns to his home, enters his complaint, and brings his action against the sheriff for false imprisonment, who may, under the operation of this bill, be subjected to all the embarrassments which I have suggested. Add to this, sir, the penalty, which is recoverable for the sole benefit of the slave claimant, together with all damages which may accrue.

Sir, I did intend to make a few remarks upon the ninth section, and also upon the complete suspension of the habeas corpus; but, as many of my reflections have been anticipated by other honorable gentlemen, and as the patience of the Senate, at this late hour, must be nearly exhausted, I will close my remarks, by observing that I present these crude suggestions at this time, that the Committee may consent to a recommitment of the bill, to review it in its various parts, amend it where it is necessary, and present it to the House in a more unexceptionable form.

TUESDAY, March 10.

On motion, by Mr. WILLIAMS of Tennessee, the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Richard Varick and others, surviving officers of the Revolutionary army, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of William Gamble; and, in concurrence therewith, resolved that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition.

Mr. STORER submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the causes which so frequently prevent the due arrival of the public mail.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH presented the memorial of the Mayor, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of Washington, praying that the 12th and 13th sections of the act of July 1st, 1812, may be modified or repealed, to relieve them from the interference of the Levy Court, and that the avenues and areas formed by such large public ways, diverging from the rectangular streets, with the bridges, trees, and lamps, which may be deemed useful or ornamental to them, may be improved by the United States, and placed under the direction and care of the Superintendent of the Public Buildings, or that such other aid be given to them as to Congress may seem just and reasonable; and the memorial was read, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. ROBERTS presented the petition of Benjamin G. Orr, and others, citizens of Washington, praying the incorporation of a fire insurance company; and the petition was read, and referred to the same committee.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of John Hall; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Friday next.

The two bills and the resolution brought up yesterday for concurrence were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The bill for the relief of Cata Bunnell, was read the second time.

On motion by Mr. FROMENTIN, the petition of Anthony Cavalier and Peter Petit, of the State of Louisiana, presented at the last session of Congress, praying the confirmation of their title to a certain tract of land in said State, was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to reduce the staff of the Army; and, on motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Thursday next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act fixing the compensation of the Secretary of the Senate and Clerk of the House of Representatives, and of the clerks employed in their offices, together with the amendments reported thereto by a select committee; and the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly, and the amendments having been concurred in, and the bill further amended, the amendments were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was read a third time as amended.

informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act respecting the district courts of the United States within the State of New York," in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The bill last mentioned was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill extending the time for locating military land warrants, in certain cases; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill respecting certain sections of land in the State of Ohio, reserved for the purposes of religion; and the bill having been amended, on motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Friday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill authorizing a subscription for the eleventh volume of State Papers; and on motion by Mr. DAGGETT, the further consideration thereof was postponed until Tuesday next.

WEDNESDAY, March 11.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill concerning the bounty or allowance to fishing vessels in certain cases; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Margaret White, widow of Colonel Anthony Walton White, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the petitioner have leave to withdraw her petition. The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Benjamin Wells, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted. The report and resolution were read.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of James Moore, also made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his petition and documents.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, Thomas Robinson and others, a committee in behalf of the surviving officers of the Pennsylvania line of the Revolutionary Army, and Richard Varick and others, surviving officers of the Revolutionary Army, had leave to withdraw their petitions respectively.

On motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Joseph W. Page, were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and the petitioner had leave to withdraw his petition.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the 15th CON. 1st SESS.—9 motion of the 10th instant for instructing the Committee on the Post Offices and Post Roads to inquire into the causes which so frequently prevent the due arrival of the public mail; and agreed thereto.

The resolution, which originated in the Senate, fixing the time for the adjournment of the first session of the fifteenth Congress, was read the second time.

The resolution from the House of Representatives, fixing the time for the adjournment of the first session of the fifteenth Congress, was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act to alter the time of holding the circuit court in the southern district of New York, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the 6th of December, and of the House of Representatives of the 24th of February last, I lay before Congress a report of the Secretary of State, and the papers referred to in it, respecting the negotiation with the Government of Spain. To explain fully the nature of the differences between the United States and Spain, and the conduct of the parties, it has been found necessary to go back to an early epoch. The recent correspondence, with the documents accompanying it, will give a full view of the whole subject, and place the conduct of the United States, in every stage, and under every circumstance, for justice, moderation, and a firm adherence to their rights, on the high and honorable ground which it has invariably sustained.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 14, 1818.

The Message, together with the accompanying documents, were read, and two hundred additional copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

The following Message was also received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the United States, of the 31st of December last, requesting the President to cause to be laid before them a statement of the proceedings which may have been had under the acts of Congress, passed on the 3d March, 1817, entitled "An act to set apart and dispose of certain public lands for the encouragement and cultivation of the vine and olive," I now transmit a report from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing all the information possessed by the Executive, relating to the proceedings under the said act.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 16, 1818.

The Message and accompanying report were read.

The following Message was also received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the Senate of the United States, of the 3d of February last, requesting the President to cause to be laid before them "a statement of the progress made under the act to provide for surveying the coast of the United States, passed February 10th, 1817, and any subsequent acts on the same subject, and the expenses incurred thereby," I

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed the resolution directing the distribution of the laws of the fourteenth Congress among the members of the fifteenth Congress, with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate; and also the resolution directing the publication and distribution of the Journal and proceedings of the Convention which formed the present Constitution of the United States, with an amendment, in which they also request the concurrence of the Senate:

They have passed a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Mississippi;" a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the erection of a court-house, jail, and public offices, within the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Abraham Byington;" a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment of certain certificates;" a bill, entitled "An act authorizing the election of a delegate from the Michigan Territory to the Congress of the United States, and extending the right of suffrage to the citizens of the said Territory;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of General Moses Porter;" and also a resolution authorizing the transportation of certain documents free of postage; in which bills and resolution they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The six bills and the resolution last brought up for concurrence were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

On motion, the resolution authorizing the transportation of certain documents free of postage, was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been made thereto, the President reported the resolution to the House; and it passed to the third reading, and it was read a third time, by unanimous consent, and passed.

On motion, the Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution directing the distribution of the laws of the fourteenth Congress, among the members of the fifteenth Congress, and concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the resolution directing the publication and distribution of the Journal and proceedings of the Convention which formed the present Constitution of the United States, and concurred therein.

On motion, by Mr. RUGGLES, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of extending the jurisdiction and laws of the Territory of Michigan to the eastern boundary of the Illinois Territory.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for adjusting claims to land, and establishing land offices in the districts east of the Island of New Orleans, together with the amendments proposed thereto; and, on the question to agree to the first amendment proposed, as follows:

"Sec. 1, line 8, after the word 'several,' strike out to the end of the section, and insert—

"Reports of the Commissioners, and which are derived from the Spanish Government, or claimed by donation, and are, in the opinion of the Commissioner, valid, agreeably to the laws, usages, and customs, of the Spanish Government, be, and the same are hereby, recognised as valid and complete titles against any claim on the part of the United States; and all the British grants contained therein, which have not been subsequently regranted by the Spanish Government, or are not claimed in right of donation, or preference to purchase, granted or authorized by this act, be, and they are hereby, confirmed and recognised as valid."

It was determined in the negative—yeas 9, nays 19, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burrill, Fromentin, Hunter, Johnson, Macon, Morrill, Talbot, Tichenor, and Williams of Mississippi.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Crittenden, Daggett, Epes, Gaillard, Horsey, King, Lacock, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Storer, Tait, Taylor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

NEGOTIATION WITH HOLLAND.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States:

In the course of the last Summer a negotiation was commenced with the Government of the Netherlands, with a view to the revival and modification of the commercial treaty existing between the two countries, adapted to their present circumstances.

The report from the Secretary of State, which I now lay before Congress, will show the progress of the conferences between the respective Plenipotentiaries, and which resulted in the agreement between them, then, to refer the subject to the consideration of their respective Governments. As the difficulties appear to be of a nature which may, perhaps, for the present, be more easily removed by reciprocal legislative regulations, formed in the spirit of amity and conciliation, than by conventional stipulations, Congress may think it advisable to leave the subsisting treaty in its present state, and to meet the liberal exemption from discriminating tonnage duties which has been conceded in the Netherlands to the vessels of the United States, by a similar exemption to the vessels of the Netherlands, which have arrived, or may hereafter arrive, in our ports, commencing from the time when the exemption was granted to the vessels of the United States. I would further recommend to the consideration of Congress the expediency of extending the benefit of the same regulation, to commence from the passage of the law, to the vessels of Prussia, Hamburg, and Bremen, and of making it prospectively general, in favor of every nation in whose ports the vessels of the United States are admitted, on the same footing as their own.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, March 17, 1818.

The Secretary of State has the honor of submitting to the consideration of the President the correspondence herewith enclosed, between the Envoys Extraordinary of the United States at the Court of the Netherlands, and the Plenipotentiaries appointed by that Government for the purpose of renewing and extending the Commercial Treaty already existing between the two countries. The failure of this negotiation is to be attributed principally to two obstacles which arose in the progress of the discussions between the respective Plenipotentiaries; one proceeding from an essential principle in the commercial regulations of this country, and the other from a principle of like character in the kingdom of the Netherlands.

The law of March 3, 1815, authorizing a partial repeal of the discriminating duties which operate against foreign shipping, and the merchandise imported in them, required, as a condition of that repeal, the abolition of all discriminating or countervailing duties of any foreign nation to whose advantage it should enure, so far as they operate to the disadvantage of the United States; and on this condition the acts of the United States, imposing discriminating duties, were declared to be repealed only so far as respects the produce or manufacture of the nation to which the foreign ship or vessel might belong. The law, therefore, required a total abolition of discriminating or countervailing duties in the foreign nation, operating against the United States, and offered only a partial repeal of our discriminating duties, which operated against them, in return. From an imperfect view of the provisions of this act, which can be fully understood only by collating it with the general system and the particular provisions of the acts imposing discriminating duties, part of which only it proposed to repeal, the Government of the Netherlands, and others, appear to have understood it as offering a total repeal of all discriminating duties, as well of tonnage as upon merchandise of every description, without distinction of origin. The power of the President was, however, restricted by the terms of the law.<sup>4</sup> The laws of the Netherlands imposed discriminating duties of tonnage, and on merchandise imported in foreign vessels, but without any distinction with regard to the origin of the merchandise. When, therefore, they revoked their discriminating duties so far as respected the United States, they considered themselves, by the act of Congress of March 3, 1815, entitled to a total repeal of the discriminating duties in the United States, operating against them; not only the tonnage duties, but those upon merchandise, whether of the produce or manufacture of the Netherlands, or of any other country. This was, however, not warranted by the act of March 3, 1815, nor could it be stipulated by treaty, without involving consequences affecting the commercial relations between the United States and other countries. The revocation of the discriminating duties upon merchandise imported in vessels of the Netherlands, would be of little avail, if limited to articles, the produce or manufacture of that country, the principal part of whose exportations consist of the produce and manufacture of others. But, on the other hand, if that distinction in our navigation and revenue laws, should be broken down with respect to one nation, it could be with difficulty, if at all, maintained with regard to any other.

The other difficulty which occurred in the negotiation, related to the admission of vessels of the United States into the colonies of the Netherlands, if not upon the same footing as into the ports of the Netherlands in Europe, at least upon that of the most favored nation. To this it was objected by the Plenipotentiaries of the Netherlands, that certain favors were granted by them to other nations themselves possessing colonies, for the equivalent of similar favors conceded in return, which could not be conceded to a nation possessing no colonies, and therefore not enabled to concede the equivalent. The same objection having been made by the British Government to the admission of vessels of the United States into their colonies, it appears to deserve attention how far the principle itself is justifiable, and how far the United States ought to acquiesce in it. There are various grounds upon which it appears objectionable. 1. Because all the other maritime States, possessing colonies more or less significant, a classification, however general in terms, which applies, by way of exclusion, to the United States alone, is manifestly a measure savoring of hostility to them, as much as if it was applied to them by name. 2. Because the United States not only, by the constant and unparalleled rapid increase of their own population, but by the great enlargement of their territory, and the admission of new States, producing almost all the articles of European colonies in this hemisphere, afford to all the commercial nations of Europe an equivalent similar in principle, and infinitely more valuable than the mere admission to two or three small islands of the West Indies, which is all that some of the European States can grant for access to the colonies of the others. 3. The United States have a just claim to a free trade with most of the colonies of the West India islands, founded in the occasional indispensable necessities of the latter. If the United States should exercise their unquestionable right of meeting prohibition with prohibition, the very existence of these islands would be in jeopardy whenever they should be visited by those hurricanes which so frequently happen among them. It would be ungenerous, and scarcely reconcilable to the principles of humanity, should the United States avail themselves of those calamitous occurrences to stop, on their part, the intercourse which at all other times is interdicted to them. By the laws of nature, no society can be justifiable in adopting measures towards another State, which may compel the latter to retaliate, in self-defence, by measures incompatible with humanity; yet such is the character of the intercourse permitted by several of the European nations between their colonies in the West Indies and the United States. Thus we have seen, within the last half year, the exclusion of our vessels from the ports of several West India islands, and their readmission, announced almost in the same gazettes. That readmission, however, is limited to the time indispensable for saving the colony from famine and utter desolation. There is something so glaringly unequal and selfish in these alternatives of arbitrary interdiction and of compulsory intercourse, that it is believed the nations of Europe, possessing colonies, cannot fail of being ultimately made sensible of it, and of consenting to establish an intercourse upon principles more permanent and more favorably marked with reciprocity.

In the mean time, as the Government of the Netherlands have placed the vessels of the United States, arriving in their ports, in regard to tonnage duties, on the same footing with their own, it is believed to be consistent with sound policy to extend the same principle to the vessels of the Netherlands arriving in the ports of the United States. The same liberality may be extended to the vessels of Prussia, Hamburg, and Bremen, who, by virtue of the like regulations in their respective ports, have claimed the benefit of the proffer made in the law of March 3, 1815. As an act of Congress is necessary for the purpose, perhaps the most expedient course would be to make it general, and, limiting its operation to the tonnage duties, or charges upon vessels, to declare that no other or higher duties of that description than are paid by vessels of the United States, shall be paid in the ports of the United States by the vessels of any European nation, in whose ports no other or higher duties of the same kind are paid by vessels of the United States, than by the vessels of such European nation itself. The measure in respect to the Netherlands, is of immediate urgency; the regulation in favor of the vessels of the United States there having already been more than a year in force, in the confidence that the corresponding measure on the part of the United States would have been adopted of course, by virtue of the act of March 3, 1815.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

The Message and accompanying report were read.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, March 23.

Resolved, That this bill pass with amendments.

CASE OF R. W. MEADE.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, asking the interposition of Congress in behalf of Richard W. Meade, an American citizen, unjustly and wantonly confined in a dungeon in Spain, by the authority of that Government, made a report; which was read, as follows:

The Committee of the Senate on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the petition of sundry citizens of Philadelphia, asking the interposition of Congress in behalf of Richard W. Meade, an American citizen, unjustly and wantonly confined in a dungeon in Spain, by the authority of that Government, have given to the subject the deliberation its importance deserved, and beg leave to submit the following report: It appears from the documents, R. W. Meade is an American citizen, who went to Spain in the year 1803 on lawful business; that in the year 1806, such was the confidence of the Government in his integrity, that he was appointed Navy Agent for the United States at the port of Cadiz; a station which he held until the time of his confinement. Such was the correctness of his deportment, as to have been appointed by the tribunal of commerce at Cadiz, with the consent of all the parties concerned, assignee of a bankrupt, the amount of whose estate involved a high responsibility. He performed the duties thus devolved upon him, honestly; and, having collected for distribution fifty thousand dollars, he several times petitioned the tribunal to permit him to remit this sum to the creditors of the bankrupt resident in England; the only proper course left him to pursue, inasmuch as he had, when appointed agent of the bankrupt, given his bond to that tribunal conditioned to take charge of the effects of the bankrupt, and to be responsible solely to the tribunal for the proceeds, being prohibited under the penalty of the bonds from disposing of the funds without the sanction of the tribunal. A controversy having arisen between the creditors and bankrupt about the distribution, Meade offered the money to either, if they would give bond, with sureties, to the satisfaction of the tribunal of commerce, by which his own might be cancelled. This they were unable to do. The tribunal, of its own accord, and unexpectedly, decided that Meade should, on the following morning, place the money in the King's treasury, until the parties litigant should give the security required; it being declared that all Meade's property should be sequestered in the case of non-payment at the time limited. The money was forthwith paid by Meade into the treasury, in treasury notes equal to specie, and hence acknowledged by the Treasurer, that the deposit had been made in due form, under his inspection, in effective specie, and that whenever the tribunal should order its payment, His Majesty would pay it in the same coin.

Notwithstanding this judgment, and the discharge thereof, by the payment aforesaid, Mr. Dermot, the agent for the British creditors, brought suit against Meade in the same court to recover the very sum he had heretofore paid in conformity to its own judgment. The court awarded judgment against Meade a second time for this money. The latter appealed to the superior tribunal, called Abradas. During its pendency, it is charged by Meade, that the cause was removed, by the interposition of the British Minister, to the council of war, and, by the same interposition, his arrest and confinement were procured, from which he could be relieved only by a repayment of the money. He has languished in confinement from the 2d of May, 1816, down to the last accounts from Spain.

The Representative of this nation at that Court has repeatedly appealed to His Catholic Majesty for the relief of Meade; and the appeal has been in vain—the Court of Spain having refused either to restore the money deposited in its own treasury, by order of its own competent judicial authority, or to release the person of Meade from the long confinement to which he had been doomed; and, finally, the President of the United States, whose peculiar province is to take cognizance of subjects of this kind, has caused a representation on the subject to be made to the Minister of Spain to the United States, demanding his immediate liberation. Nothing but a confidence that this representation will produce the desired result, would have restrained your committee from recommending the adoption of measures of severe retribution.

Your committee are of opinion, that it is due to the dignity of the United States to adopt, as a fundamental rule of its policy, the principle, that one of its citizens, to whatever region of the earth his lawful business may carry him, and who demeans himself as becomes his character, is entitled to the protection of his Government, and whatever intentional injury may be done him should be retaliated by the employment, if necessary, of the whole force of the nation.

MEDALS TO HARRISON AND SHELBY.

Mr. DICKERSON, agreeably to notice given yesterday, asked leave to introduce a resolution offering the thanks of Congress to Major General William Henry Harrison and Isaac Shelby, late Governor of Kentucky, for their distinguished bravery and good conduct in capturing the British army under command of Major General Proctor, at the battle of the Thames, in Upper Canada, on the 5th of October, 1813.

I should not, said Mr. DICKERSON, at this late day, highly as I think of the merits of those officers who, in co-operation with the hero of Lake Erie, turned the tide of war in our favor, bring forward the present resolution, if no similar attempt had heretofore been made in their favor, but would leave their fame to rest upon the testimony of impartial history, which has already done ample justice to their characters.

Two years ago a resolution like the present was reported to this House by the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, by direction of that committee. This resolution was opposed on two grounds, applying solely to General Harrison, as I have been informed, for I had not then the honor of being a member of this body: the first, that an inquiry was at that time depending before the House of Representatives into the official conduct of General Harrison as commander in chief of the northwestern army, upon charges which, if well founded, were calculated essentially to injure his character; the second, that a rumor prevailed that General Harrison had discovered some reluctance in pursuing Proctor and his army after Perry's victory on Lake Erie, and that he had been forced to the pursuit by the remonstrances of Governor Shelby, and that this information had been derived from the declarations of Governor Shelby. These charges, utterly unfounded as they turned out to be, were deemed a sufficient reason for postponing a decision of the report of the committee until the result of the inquiry before the House of Representatives should at least be known. The resolution, after some discussion, was referred to the committee who reported it, further to consider and report thereon. As the session was near its close no further report was made, and indeed no further report could with propriety have been made, until the investigation before the House of Representatives should be brought to a termination. This did not happen till the 23d of January, 1817, a little more than a month before the termination of a very important session, when the public business of the most pressing kind required the entire attention of Congress, so that this subject could not with propriety have been renewed until the present session.

As the friends of General Harrison have it now in their power completely to obviate every objection heretofore made to the passage of this resolution, it is their duty to bring this subject again before Congress, more especially as the journals of this House, if left unexplained, imply a censure upon the conduct of General Harrison, which certainly was never intended. I will confess, for one, that on a perusal of the journals of this House, the military reputation of General Harrison sunk in my estimation; and I believe this confession might be made by three-fourths of the citizens of the United States who read the proceedings of Congress, and who had not an intimate knowledge of the character and conduct of General Harrison. I should reproach myself for having suffered such an impression to be made upon my mind, if the means of correcting it had also been found upon the journals. Those journals did not then afford the means of correct information upon this subject, nor do they till this day.

As to the first objection, that an investigation was depending in the House of Representatives into the official conduct of General Harrison, the result of that investigation was in the highest degree honorable to his character. The committee to whom the subject was referred were unanimously of opinion that General Harrison stood above suspicion of being implicated in the charges exhibited against him, and that in his whole conduct as commander-in-chief of the northwestern army he was governed by a laudable zeal for and devotion to the public service and interest.

Proceedings.

SENATE.

The second objection made to the passage of the resolution, if well founded, was calculated to give to Governor Shelby the entire and exclusive merit of having urged the pursuit of Proctor and his army. But Shelby, generous as he is brave, disclaims this exclusive merit, and in a letter, which I beg leave to read, denies in the most positive terms having used the language ascribed to him; and he gives to General Harrison the highest praise for his promptitude and vigilance in pursuing Proctor; for the skill with which he arranged his troops for meeting the enemy, and for his distinguished bravery during the battle. He states that the duties of General Harrison, as commander-in-chief of the northwestern army, were in the highest degree arduous; but that, from the zeal and fidelity with which they were performed, they could not have been committed to better hands. Of these particulars no one could know better, no one could judge better, than Governor Shelby. I have many other documents and papers to show that Governor Shelby was not mistaken in the statements which he has made, which I will read if any doubt shall be expressed upon this subject. I trust, however, that no such doubt will be entertained, and am confident that honorable gentlemen will now, upon a full knowledge of the facts, feel a pleasure in awarding to General Harrison that testimony of applause which a sense of duty induced them formerly to withhold.

I shall not pronounce any encomiums upon the gallantry of the venerable patriot, the intrepid hero, Governor Shelby. His distinguished services during the late war, as well as those of the Revolutionary war, will be remembered to the latest posterity. Of him and the brave officers and men who, under the command of General Harrison, achieved the glorious victory at the battle of the Thames, one sentiment pervades the Union, that they merit every mark of distinction which Congress and a grateful country can bestow.

Mr. D. then offered the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the thanks of Congress be and they are hereby presented to Major General William Henry Harrison, and Isaac Shelby, late Governor of Kentucky, and through them to the officers and men under their command, for their gallantry and good conduct in defeating the combined British and Indian forces under Major General Proctor, on the Thames, in Upper Canada, on the fifth day of October, one thousand eight hundred and thirteen, capturing the British army, with their baggage, camp equipage, and artillery; and that the President of the United States be requested to cause two gold medals to be struck, emblematical of this triumph, and presented to General Harrison and Isaac Shelby, late Governor of Kentucky.

The resolution was read and passed to a second reading.

NAYS—Messrs. Macon and Stokes.

SEMINOLE INDIANS.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the Senate of the United States:

I now lay before Congress all the information in the possession of the Executive, respecting the war with the Seminoles, and the measures which it has been thought proper to adopt, for the safety of our fellow-citizens on the frontier exposed to their ravages. The enclosed documents show, that the hostilities of this tribe were unprovoked, the offspring of a spirit long cherished, and often manifested towards the United States, and that, in the present instance, it was extending itself to other tribes, and daily assuming a more serious aspect. As soon as the nature and object of this combination were perceived, the Major General commanding the Southern division of the troops of the United States, was ordered to the theatre of action, charged with the management of the war, and vested with the powers necessary to give it effect. The season of the year being unfavorable to active operations, and the recesses of the country affording shelter to these savages, in case of retreat, may prevent a prompt termination of the war, but it may be fairly presumed that it will not be long before this tribe, and its associates, receive the punishment which they have provoked, and justly merited.

MARCH, 1818.

Staff of the Army.

SENATE.

As almost the whole of this tribe inhabits the country within the limits of Florida, Spain was bound, by the Treaty of 1795, to restrain them from committing hostilities against the United States. We have seen, with regret, that her Government has altogether failed to fulfil this obligation, nor are we aware that it made any effort to that effect. When we consider her utter inability to check, even in the slightest degree, the movements of this tribe, by her very small and incompetent force in Florida, we are not disposed to ascribe the failure to any other cause. The inability, however, of Spain, to maintain her authority over the territory, and Indians within her limits, and in consequence to fulfil the treaty, ought not to expose the United States to other and greater injuries. When the authority of Spain ceases to exist there, the United States have a right to pursue their enemy, on a principle of a self-defence. In this instance, the right is more complete and obvious, because we shall perform only what Spain was bound to have performed herself. To the high obligations and privileges of this great and sacred right of self-defence will the movement of our troops be strictly confined. Orders have been given to the General in command, not to enter Florida, unless it be in pursuit of the enemy, and in that case, to respect the Spanish authority, wherever it is maintained, and he will be instructed to withdraw his forces from the province, as soon as he shall have reduced that tribe to order, and secure our fellow-citizens, in that quarter, by satisfactory arrangements, against its unprovoked and savage hostilities in future.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, March 25, 1818.

The Message and accompanying documents were read, and two hundred additional copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the Senate.

STAFF OF THE ARMY.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to reduce the staff of the Army, together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Military Affairs; and the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and, on the question to concur in the following amendment agreed to as in Committee of the Whole:

SEC. 6. And be it further enacted, That after the first day of June, 1819, the present system of supplying the Army with rations be abolished, and that in lieu thereof there shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one commissary general, with the rank, pay, and emoluments of colonel of ordnance, who shall, before entering on the duties of his office, give bond and security, in such sum as the President may direct, and as many assistants, to be taken from the subalterns of the line, as the service may require, who shall receive twenty dollars per month, in addition to their pay in the line, and who shall, before entering on the duties of their office, give bond and security, in such sums as the President may direct. The commissary general, and his assistants, shall perform such duties, in purchasing and issuing of rations to the Army of the United States, as the President may direct.

SEC. 7. And be it further enacted, That supplies for the Army, unless in particular and urgent cases the Secretary of War should otherwise direct, shall be purchased by contract, to be made by the commissary general, on public notice, to be delivered on inspection, in the bulk, and at such places as shall be stipulated; which contract shall be made under such regulations as the Secretary of War may direct.

SEC. 8. And be it further enacted, That the President may make such alterations in the component parts of the ration as a due regard to the health and comfort of the Army, and economy may require.

SEC. 9. And be it further enacted, That the commissary general, and his assistants, shall not be concerned, directly or indirectly, in the purchase or sale, in trade or commerce, of any article entering into the composition of the ration, allowed to the troops in the service of the United States, except on account of the United States; nor shall such officer take and apply to his own use any gain or emolument for negotiating or transacting any business connected with the duties of his office, other than what is or may be allowed by law; and the commissary general, and his assistants, shall be subject to martial law.

SEC. 10. And be it further enacted, That all letters to and from the commissary general, which may relate to his office duties, shall be free from postage.

It was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 5, as follows:

YEAS—MRSRS. Barbour, Crittenden, Daggett, Eppes, Fromentin, Gaillard, Horsey, King, Lacock, Macon, Morril, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Troup, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson;" and it was referred to the Committee of Claims.

HONORS TO COLONEL R. M. JOHNSON.

Agreeably to notice given, Mr. BARBOUR asked and obtained leave to bring in a resolution requesting the President of the United States, to present to Colonel Richard M. Johnson, a sword, as a testimony of the high sense entertained by Congress of the daring and distinguished valor displayed by himself and the regiment of volunteers under his command, in charging the enemy on the Thames, in Upper Canada, on the 5th October, 1813; and the resolution was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole, and having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, the resolution was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

On introducing the proposition for causing a sword to be presented to Colonel R. M. Johnson—

Mr. BARBOUR said, in availing himself of the notice given on yesterday, of asking leave to introduce a resolution, whose object would be to present to Colonel Richard M. Johnson some testimonial of the high sense entertained by the nation of the distinguished services rendered by him on the 5th October, 1813, in the battle of the Thames, he considered himself bound to make a few remarks, disclosing the propriety of granting the leave asked.

As to the distinguished merit of Colonel Johnson, he presumed there could be no difference of opinion; the only objection that could possibly present itself would be, the time when the resolution was presented, or possibly the grade which Colonel Johnson held in the army. To remove these, if they exist, was all that devolved on him. As to the objection of time, it will at once be removed by reflecting on that which has just occurred—the vote of thanks which has been awarded in favor of General Harrison and Governor Shelby. It is not unknown that rumor, the result of envy, or some other bad passion, had attempted to throw a shade around the character of that distinguished commander. He felt as he ought, and sought an investigation, to vindicate his character from the foul aspersions which had been cast upon it. It, after some delay, took place, and resulted in an honorable acquittal. In the mean time the venerable Shelby was, at his own request, withheld from the notice of the nation, as it regarded the distinguished services he had rendered—Shelby, a name which can never be mentioned without awakening, in every American bosom, emotions of gratitude. I see in this illustrious character a display of that love of country and chivalrous spirit which conceived and effected our independence, and, unabated by age, it reappeared to vindicate those rights, to the establishment of which, in his more youthful days, he had so essentially contributed; but, he is as generous as he is brave, and he refused to accept a tribute of respect, whose indirect consequence might have been a reflection on the Commander-in-chief, to whose zeal, patriotism, and capacity in conducting this campaign, he always bore a cheerful testimony. Colonel Johnson, influenced by the same sensibility, peremptorily refused to his friends the permission of bringing this subject before the Representatives of the people. I, however, will barely remark, in regard to the commanding General, that, with the regrets which the delay of justice to this citizen must necessarily create, will be mingled some consolation in the reflection, that his character has been entirely purified from the censure which had been improperly cast upon it; and that the meed now dispensed has the sanction of the deliberate judgment of the nation, unbiassed by passion or the false fire of the moment. He will now receive it with a grateful feeling, as the highest reward which freemen can give, or a freeman receive.

With regard to Colonel Johnson, it is due to him to say, this proposition is now made without his consent. Mr. B. however, who took a pride in calling him his friend, took the responsibility upon himself, because he thought it would be an act of consummate injustice, were no lasting memorial to be erected to the valor which he so signally displayed on the occasion alluded to. Another motive with Mr. B. was, a notification on the part of Colonel Johnson, of his retiring from public life. While he regretted this event as a serious loss to the public councils, he was perfectly satisfied that his reasons were sufficient to justify it. While upon this subject he would barely add, that he was satisfied it would not be deemed an exaggeration when he asserted, that no man in Congress had performed more service than Colonel Johnson. In addition to the just claims of his own particular constituents upon him, what part of the Union is it from which applications have not been made and cheerfully attended to by this patriotic citizen? So much for the first objection that might possibly be made, although he did not anticipate it. As to the second difficulty, that might exist in the opinion of some gentlemen, the grade of Colonel Johnson—if there were no precedent applicable to this case, Mr. B. would have had no difficulty in fixing one. It is the attribute of all Governments to adapt their proceedings to the endless vicissitudes which human affairs continually present. The valor displayed by Colonel Johnson is unsurpassed by any example in the annals of mankind. But it is not now necessary to press this question, because you have a precedent in the case of McDonough and his associates, in the distinguished victory gained by them on Lake Champlain, over a British squadron, and some others. Mr. B. said, he should but ill represent the feelings of his friend, or his own, if, in asking for this tribute of respect, anything could be inferred from what is said or done, unfavorable to those patriotic officers holding grades between Colonel Johnson and the Commander-in-chief. It was but justice to them to say, that, had it been their good fortune, on the day of battle, to have had the post of honor, they would have acquired those laurels so dearly earned by Colonel Johnson. Generous as brave, so far from looking with an eye of envy upon this honorable tribute of gratitude, dispensed in behalf of this distinguished citizen, they will warmly participate in the fine feelings with which Colonel Johnson will receive this mark of his country's distinction.

As to the merit of Colonel Johnson to this evidence of our gratitude, Mr. B. said, he had already declared that upon this point there could be no difference of opinion. To expatiate upon it, would be unnecessary; yet he could not dismiss this subject without briefly enumerating some of the leading acts of his public life, so far at least as they connect themselves with the question under consideration.

Let it then be remembered that he was zealously in favor of the war. Not content with the distinguished place he held in the councils of the nation, he patriotically resolved to vindicate with his own arm those rights which he had so manfully asserted while voting for the declaration of war. He erects his standard and proclaims his purpose, and, although much was to have been expected from the patriotism, the zeal, the enterprise, and courage of Kentucky—a people Mr. B. delighted to honor, as, in addition to their merit, he considered them his own kindred, thousands of his near and highly respected relations being there—although, he said, much was to have been expected, yet, when we reflect upon the devotedness of those old and young, rich and poor, rallying around the standard of their country, we see a new subject of admiration.

In doing justice to those patriots, let it not be understood that any invidious distinction is intended to be made in their favor. Mr. B. said he well knew that illustrious examples of courage and patriotism were exhibited in other portions of the Union, and on all proper occasions he was prepared to lift his feeble voice to do them ample justice. But, to return to the patriotic volunteers, who embodied at the call of Colonel Johnson, displaying a spectacle as honorable to themselves as to Colonel Johnson—manifesting the high confidence they reposed in this their illustrious citizen—these brave men, leaving their homes and their domestic blessings, and, weighing the honor of their country and the defence of her rights, against the privations and hazards of war, willingly accepted them as an equivalent. Undeterred by the difficulties or dangers to which they are about to be exposed, they fearlessly commit themselves to the trackless desert, to the secret danger of the ambuscaded savage, or the more open perils of their less savage ally. A night of misfortune had shed its disastrous gloom over our affairs. It was given to Commodore Perry to turn back the tide of adversity upon the fountain from which it flowed. Lake Erie was reserved for the display of the brilliant superiority of American bravery and seamanship over our then haughty foe—achieving a victory, which, in the language of President Madison, will fill an early page in our naval annals, as having never been surpassed in lustre, however much it may have been in magnitude. The way having been opened, the commanding General and his veteran associate, with promptitude, availed themselves of the opportunity thus offered, to throw themselves in the enemy's country, and pursuing, with unanimity and with an unexampled rapidity, (of which pursuit Colonel Johnson led the van,) speedily overtook them. The battle is arrayed; the post of honor, for such he made it, is assigned Colonel Johnson. The enemy have the Thames on the left; a British regiment, seven hundred strong, has also a ravine on the right, beyond which was the celebrated Tecumseh, at the head of fifteen hundred savages—a force truly formidable. When we refer to the commander, of whom it may be said, unless his character has been greatly exaggerated, that, had he have been favored with the embellishments of civilized life, and the benefits of military experience, he would have been one of the most distinguished captains of the present eventful period; to which, when we superadd that his associates were acting under the impression of their being under the particular favor of Heaven, it well may be said that the force thus to be encountered was indeed formidable. This force, so placed, and so formidable to ordinary minds, presented nothing alarming to the mounted regiment. Colonel Johnson divides his regiment, say one thousand strong—one battalion placed under the command of Colonel James Johnson, who gave, in accepting his station under a younger brother, an honorable evidence of his patriotism; the other battalion, headed by himself, passed a defile, and placed itself on the right of the marsh. The bugle was to announce the readiness for attack. The sound is heard, and, mingled with the watchword, victory or death, floated along the line. The British force was overwhelmed in an instant; they threw down their arms, and on their knees supplicated mercy. Although there was a long account of unatoned-for blood, impiously shed by this united British and Indian force, and retaliation justified even to their entire extermination, yet, at the cry of mercy, the sword was immediately sheathed, and the guilty survived. Far different was the conflict with the savage foe; there man was opposed to man, in single combat, rifle to rifle, and tomahawk to tomahawk; wounds and death were mutually dealt out. Colonel Johnson, early in the combat, received two severe wounds, attended with the loss of much blood. In this trying crisis an ordinary courage would have retired from the combat; on him it had a different effect. It seemed to impart to him new courage, which manifested itself in a prodigy of valor, which loses nothing in a comparison with the most splendid achievement recorded in the whole extent of "backward time." Calling around him twenty spirits, the bravest among the brave, he resolved, at their head, to precipitate himself on the fiercest part of the conflict, where Tecumseh in person commanded, and who was the soul of the battle. Of these daring spirits, composing the forlorn hope, one only escaped. The others were all cut down, some to rise no more; the remainder mangled by numerous wounds, of which the subject of the present resolution had his melancholy share. Bleeding, exhausted by effusion of blood, and alone, his fate seemed inevitable, when Tecumseh, cool and collected, approached with his unerring rifle and ruthless tomahawk. It pleased Providence to interpose. Amidst universal carnage, and in the teeth of approaching death, Colonel Johnson remained undismayed, and hurled at Tecumseh that death which had been prepared for him. This is the man and the services to which Mr. B. wished an honorable testimony to be erected, one more lasting than that which is found in evanescent papers of the day. If anything was necessary to be added in support of the high claims of this distinguished citizen upon the gratitude of his country, it would be found in the honorable notice taken of him by the commanding General, and repeated, in the most flattering manner, by President Madison, in communicating the result of the battle to Congress. But it is more than unnecessary to furnish any additional proofs. Wherever there is an American, the courage and services of Colonel Johnson are known and applauded. Mr. B. indulged a hope, bordering on confidence, that the measure he now proposed would receive the unanimous consent of the Senate, for in that unanimity its principal merit would consist.

The bill to alter and establish the boundary line between the State of Mississippi and the Alabama Territory, was read the second time.

The bill for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker, was read the second time.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Joseph Thorn," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill entitled "An act making further appropriations for the construction of the Cumberland road," was read the second time, and referred to the committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to roads, inland navigation, and seminaries of learning, to consider and report thereon.

The bill entitled "An act fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress," was read the second time.

The amendment to the bill, entitled "An act confirming the claim of Tobias Rheams to a tract of land granted to him by the Spanish Government," was read a third time; and having been further amended by unanimous consent, the bill was passed with amendments.

The bill for the relief of Lemuel H. Osgood, was read a third time, and passed.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of the officers and soldiers of the Rhode Island brigade; and, also, the petition of Joseph Hull, were discharged from the further consideration thereof respectively.

On motion by Mr. BURRILL, leave was given to withdraw the memorial of the officers and soldiers of the Rhode Island brigade, their heirs and representatives.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Michael Jones; and the blank having been filled with "one thousand five hundred," the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing the legal representatives of William Daniel to file with the proper register of the land office a Spanish patent for a tract of land lying in the State of Mississippi; and on motion by Mr. BURRILL, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in July next.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract," with amendments; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of George Pearson;" a bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the Laws of the United States, and for other purposes;" and, also, a bill, entitled "An act to change the name of the District of Erie, in the State of Ohio;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office, and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract; and on motion by Mr. MORROW, they were referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill for the relief of Aquila Giles; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to increase the compensation of certain judges of the courts of the United States; and the bill having been amended, on motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, that further consideration thereof be postponed until the first Monday in July next, it was determined in the negative—yeas 13, nays 18, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Dickerson, Lacock, Macon, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Storer, Talbot, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Otis, Smith, Stokes, Tait, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

FRIDAY, April 3.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Francis Henderson, made a report, accompanied by a bill for the relief of Francis Henderson; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to the second reading.

The bill for the relief of Aquila Giles was read the second time.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of George Pearson," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the Laws of the United States, and for other purposes," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill entitled "An act to change the name of the District of Erie, in the State of Ohio," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of William P. Farrand and others, importing merchants of Philadelphia; and on motion by Mr. ROBERTS, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in May next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, on the memorial of John Hall, and the further consideration thereof was postponed until Monday next.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment of certain certificates, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriation for the support of Government for the year 1818," reported the same with amendments; which were read and considered as in Committee; and having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was read a third time as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah Dewees, relict and widow of William Dewees, deceased, and the heirs and legal representatives of the said William Dewees;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Gad Worthington;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the houses of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher, and Company; Thomas Clifford and Son, and Thos. Clifford, of Philadelphia, and Charles Wigram of Baltimore;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Rodgers;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain friendly Creek Indians, of the mixed blood;" in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed a bill, which originated in the Senate, to provide for paying to the State of Indiana, three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of the United States' lands within the same," with an amendment; in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill last mentioned; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

Mr. TARR, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill to repeal part of the act, entitled "An act to provide for surveying the coasts of the United States;" and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill, confirming Anthony Cavalier and Peter Petit in their claim to a tract of land; and the bill was twice read by unanimous consent.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, reported a bill, authorizing the disposal of certain lots of public ground in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill for the relief of Michael Jones was read a third time, and passed.

The bill, in addition to "An act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808," and to repeal certain parts of the same, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to increase the compensation of certain judges of the courts of the United States, and the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Narcissus Broutin and others," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands; and the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed and the bill was read a third time as amended.

Mr. BARBOUR gave notice, that he should ask leave to-morrow to bring in a resolution authorizing a subscription for the edition of "Statistical Annals, embracing views of the population, commerce, navigation, fisheries, public lands, post office establishment, revenues, mint, military and naval establishments, expenditures, public debt, and sinking fund of the United States."

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Alabama;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution directing the printing and distribution of the act to provide for the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army; and, on motion by Mr. TALBOT, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in July next.

Mr. KING submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury, do report to the Senate, the sum of the funded debt of the United States, bearing an interest of seven, six, and three per cent.; distinguishing the amount of each, that has been paid by the subscribers towards the capital of the Bank of the United States, distinguishing also the sums of the respective species of funded debt paid on account of the several instalments to the said bank. Stating the sums and species of funded debt sold by the bank; how much thereof was purchased or redeemed by the United States, and how much has been sold without the United States.

NAVIGATION BILL.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill concerning navigation, reported by the Committee of Foreign Relations on Wednesday.

[The first section provides, that from and after the 30th of September next, the ports of the United States shall be and remain closed against every vessel owned wholly or in part by a subject or subjects of His Britannic Majesty, coming or arriving from any port or place in a colony or territory of His Britannic Majesty, that is or shall be, by the ordinary laws of navigation and trade, closed against vessels owned by citizens of the United States; and every such vessel, so excluded from the ports of the United States, that shall enter, or attempt to enter the same, in violation of this act, shall, with her tackle, apparel, and furniture, together with the cargo on board such vessel, be forfeited to the United States.

The 2d section provides, substantially, that any British vessel entering our ports, shall, on her departure, if laden with the productions of the United States, give bonds not to land her cargo at any of the British ports prohibited in the first section, and to forfeit vessel, tackle, &c., if she attempts to sail without so giving bond.

The 3d section enacts the manner of recovering the penalties, accounting for them, &c.]

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said, as the organ of the committee who reported the bill, it was expected of him by the Senate that he should disclose the views of the committee on this interesting subject.

It certainly behooved the Senate to give this subject its most serious attention, and to act only upon the most mature deliberation; for remember, when once adopted, it must be adhered to. To recede, would be to insure an endless duration to the serious evils of which we complain, and, what is still of more consequence, it must be attended with a diminution of character. Any policy, adopted by the unanimous consent of the nation, founded in justice and wisdom, and sustained by perseverance, must finally be felt and yielded to by any and every nation on which it operates. The object of the bill under consideration, is to relieve from the effects of measures adopted by Great Britain in relation to our commercial intercourse with her North American colonies and West Indies; measures exclusively against us, as injurious to our navigating interest as they are offensive to our dignity. The invidious policy of which we complain, and which is attended with such unpleasant effects, may be summed up in a few words. She has shut her ports in the possessions formerly alluded to, against American vessels and American property. Not a cock-boat, not an atom of anything that is American, does she permit to enter, while she modestly insists to bring everything that she pleases from these possessions to the United States, and to purchase, and exclusively to carry the produce and manufactures of the United States in return; that is, she insists upon, and we have been tame enough to submit to it, to enjoy exclusively the whole of this valuable intercourse.

The evil has been of long standing; it commenced upon our becoming an independent people. She was not generous enough to forget that we had been enemies, nor wise enough to profit by a liberal policy. She would have found in the same language, the same habits, the same feelings; and in the kind affections inseparably attending two people of a common origin, except when repressed by injustice or oppression, she would have found in these circumstances sure guarantees to an uninterrupted, friendly, and, to her, highly beneficial intercourse. But other counsels prevailed, and displayed a new proof of the mortifying truth that small, indeed, is the portion of wisdom that directs the government of human affairs. Hence, the moment she acknowledged our independence, she immediately denounced against the United States all the rigor of her colonial system—departing from it only in such parts as would promote her interest, and render it more injurious and humiliating to us. She superciliously rejected all offers at negotiation. The United States, without a common head, and pursuing among themselves an insulated, and frequently a selfish and an unwise policy, became the foot-balls of Great Britain, who, watching, as she always does, with a sleepless eye, whatever is to affect her commerce, seized instantly upon her defenceless prey, and pushed her exclusive system to the uttermost of endurance. In this spirit, instead of being content with enforcing towards us the real colonial system, which was, that the trade should be exclusive through and with the mother country, she permitted the produce of her dependencies to be brought directly to this country, and the produce of this country to be carried back directly to them, but both operations to be effected exclusively by British shipping, to the consequent exclusion of the American shipping from the transportation of the produce even of America. So injurious were the effects resulting from our commercial intercourse, and so entirely unable were the United States to counteract these effects in their then disjointed condition, that our sanguine anticipations from the successful result of our Revolution, began fast to dissipate, and no little solicitude to be experienced in regard to the future. This state of things produced a convention of the States, and finally resulted in our present happy Constitution. I am authorized to say, from the best authority, that it is to this cause chiefly, if not entirely, that we are indebted for this greatest blessing of Heaven. In looking through the history of mankind, and tracing the causes which contribute to the rise and downfall of nations, it frequently becomes a subject of curious speculation, when we see the most propitious results flowing from apparently injurious causes and the worst passions of mankind converted into the means of furthering some beneficent purpose of Providence. Little did the statesman of Britain think, when indulging his thirst for cupidity or revenge, that he was to become the involuntary benefactor of America, by essentially contributing to the order of things which now exists, and which, under Providence, will insure us an endless succession of power, of prosperity, and of happiness.

The new Government being organized, it turned its attention to the particular subject intrusted to its care. Unfortunately, however, other objects, both foreign and domestic, interposed before its deliberations ripened into action. Europe was agitated by a convulsion the most important in the annals of the world, whether we regard its duration, its extent, or its effects. During this troubled state of the world, the policy now under consideration, engaged the attention of Congress. The result of the effort at that time is known to the Senate—the causes leading thereto lie out of the proper sphere of the present discussion. Mr. Jay was sent to England—he negotiated a treaty—so much of it as relates to the trade in question, eventuated in nothing; but such was the condition of the nations of Europe, that we enjoyed, from the necessities of England, what we had a right to expect from her justice. America became the carrier of the world, and her commerce, her shipping, and her wealth, increased in the most astonishing ratio, till at length America, in her turn, felt the effects of war, and its frequent privations. Peace was no sooner established, than Great Britain resorted to her colonial system, with all its abuse. The more intolerable, as it is exclusively directed against us, inasmuch as she indulges to the vessels of other nations an intercourse withheld from us; a course aggravated by the consideration that she stands alone in this policy, American vessels being admitted into the French, Spanish, Dutch, and Swedish colonies. This course, so injurious to our interest, and so offensive to a just pride, claimed the immediate attention of the Government, and efforts were made to obtain redress by a treaty; the result is known. Mr. B. begged leave to read so much of President Madison's Message at the last session of Congress, as regards this subject. Here you perceive the door of negotiation is closed; all hope of redress in that way is desperate, and he calls upon Congress to interpose. Independently of the respect due to the recommendation of a President of the United States, there were other considerations which would give a weight to this opinion of Mr. Madison. When it is recollected, that he devoted the whole of his most useful life to his country, with motives always pure, and with a judgment but little liable to err, guided as it was by a superior genius; when such a man, from the commencement of the Government, down to the moment of his quitting public life, with the benefit of thirty years' observation and experience, invariably entertains the same opinion, and, in his last solemn appeal to the nation, strongly inculcates the propriety of the measure now under consideration, Mr. B. was justifiable in saying a recommendation thus sustained would receive from the Senate a degree of consideration far beyond that arising from mere official respect. In addition to this, we have been advised by President Monroe of his fruitless attempts to procure redress by negotiation, and he also submits to Congress the propriety of interposing by regulations, whose effects will produce that which he has in vain sought to obtain by negotiation.

This question, then, solemnly addresses itself to the patriotism, to the wisdom, and to the dignity of the Senate. Will you patiently stand by and fold your arms together, in apathetic indifference, while Great Britain pursues a policy towards us as unjust as it is injurious, or will you, by becoming firmness, taking justice as your guide, and equality as your object, adopt a measure, whose effect will be to retort the invidious policy on its first parent, and enable us to address her in a quarter where she is never deaf to her interest?

Mr. B. said, there was a general rule in regard to intercourse with all nations he was willing to adopt, or enforce, as a fundamental principle of our policy—perfect reciprocity; to mete out the same measure to each that was dispensed to us. Who can or will object to this rule? A different one supposes an inferiority. But every American Senator would scout such an assertion. Sir, the same rules are applicable to the intercourse of nations as to that of individuals. Where is the man worthy of the name, who would not indignantly reject a proposed intercourse with another, on the degrading terms that he should not visit his house but under circumstances of degradation, while the other should claim access when, and how, and upon what terms he himself dictated? Nations are but aggregations of men, and Mr. B. could perceive no reason why they should make, in their aggregate capacity, a surrender of that attribute, self-respect, so essential to the genuine dignity of man. Upon this ground alone, with due deference to the opinion of others, it seemed to him Congress were bound to interpose; but he should but feebly discharge his duty, were he to leave the question here. For the sake of method and perspicuity, however, Mr. B. proposed further to discuss the subject, under three heads:

1. The extensive and injurious effects of the policy complained of, as it regards our shipping interest.

2. He would undertake to show that redress was attainable, and would be produced by the proposed measure.

3. That entire prohibition of all intercourse was better, than seeking to effect it by heavy duties.

Before he commenced the proposed investigation, he would make a preliminary remark. He took it for granted, that it was the settled policy of the nation to become a naval power. Perhaps there is no one question upon which there is more unanimity. From one extremity of the nation to the other there is but one sentiment, but one wish, everywhere expressed, and that is, that it may go on to increase; and in fond anticipation, judging from the lustre of its achievements during the war, they see, in its increase, an increase corresponding with the resources of the nation—the guarantee of our safety and glory. But these fond hopes are all illusory, unless wisdom directs our councils. Vain, foolish, your resolutions to build ships, unless you protect your navigation. It is not to the superior fixtures of your vessels, or the ampleness of their supplies, you are to look for victory, but to the number and experience of your sailors. If you suffer the Power who looks with jealousy on your rising commerce, and with envy on the glory of your navy, to exclude you from the participation of those advantages which of right, as being derived from nature, belong to you, abandon all thoughts of an efficient marine, and withdraw from the ocean. But, Mr. B. would proceed to show the effects of the policy complained of. These will be classed under two heads; first, as it regards the tonnage employed directly between the United States and the colonies of Great Britain; and, second, the indirect effect on the intercourse between this country and the European possessions of Great Britain.

1. The direct trade of the colonies.

The amount of tonnage employed in this trade may be stated as equal to 138,000, round numbers. This result is arrived at by a perusal of a communication from a very intelligent citizen of the United States, who resided in the West Indies, and who has been intimately acquainted with the trade for thirty-five years; and, further, his statement is said to be founded on an official document. He predicates his statement upon the calculation that Jamaica is equal in its trade and productions to all the West India possessions of Great Britain beside. From the 30th of September, 1803, to the 30th of September, 1804, 69,525 tons of shipping entered Jamaica alone from America, but Jamaica only employs one-half; hence, 138,000 tons may be presumed to have sailed from America to all the West Indies, to man which, taking as an estimate five men to a 100 tons, requires upwards of 6,000 seamen. From any participation in this we are entirely excluded. Did this result from the superior advantages which Great Britain naturally possessed over us, or from any regulation she had adopted, founded in justice, while it might be a subject of regret, it could not be of complaint? But such is not the fact. It is by an assumption on her part, and a tame surrender on ours, of that which has been awarded us by nature herself. But the loss of tonnage, and the consequent non-employment of seamen, are not limited to the direct intercourse merely, but materially affect what Mr. B. proposed as the second view of this subject, the navigation between the United States and the European possessions of Great Britain. This proposition will be most easily illustrated by an example: a British ship arrives in the United States, direct from Great Britain, with a cargo, unloads in one of our ports, takes in a cargo of lumber, goes to the West Indies, delivers it, and, finding freight scarce, she sails to New Orleans, procures a load of tobacco, cotton, &c., and proceeds to Great Britain; here two or three of the freights belongs of right to the shipping of America, as being the growth of America. Yet British ships, from the policy complained of, monopolize the whole. An American vessel going from a Northern or an Eastern port with a view to take a cargo for Europe, goes in ballast to New Orleans. Even from the colonies in North America vessels are daily entering our ports, laden with plaster, fish, and the product of their colonies; these are commuted in some ports of the United States for such cargoes as are wanted in the West Indies, whither they sell or exchange their cargo, and procure a freight in the produce of the islands. Again, British ships engaged in the West India trade, frequently leave home with cargoes of little value, such as crates of earthenware, coal, salt, come to the United States, procure cargoes for the West Indies, and return home freighted with the productions of the islands; while the American trade is limited to a direct trade only with the possessions of Great Britain in Europe. They return, generally, in ballast. The bulky supplies furnished by America require, perhaps, one hundred vessels to be transported to Great Britain, while what they receive in return (the costly fabrics of British manufacture) may be brought back in some two or three. That the result of this unequal contest should be unfavorable, cannot be matter of surprise. That it has not been more so, is accounted for only by the industry and enterprise of our seafaring people. Your ports and harbors, however, exhibit melancholy proofs of the decline of our shipping interest, and it is impossible to contemplate the spectacle without experiencing sincere regret, as well for the misfortune of the individuals whose hopes of independence have been the victim of this unjust policy, as for the alarming consequences in a national point of view; the drying up the spring from which flows our maritime strength.

The second point of view in which Mr. B. proposed to discuss this subject, is redress within our hands; and is it likely to result from the proposed measure?

To understand this question correctly, it will be necessary to advert to the amount of the imports from the dependencies in question, as also the exports; the constituent parts of both, and the capacity of the United States to supply herself elsewhere, with those productions, which from habit have become somewhat essential to comfort.

1. As to imports: he felt it necessary to state that the facts he was about to employ had been furnished him by an honorable member of the other House, (Mr. SEYBERT,) who had extracted them from a statistical work written by himself, founded on official documents, with a view of which Mr. B. had been favored; and he owed it to that gentleman to state, that he considered it by far the most valuable compilation of the kind he had ever seen, which ought, by some means, to become public property; and he should consider himself bound, if he could discover that such a motion would be favorably received, to lay a resolution on the table to effect that object; but, to proceed, he begged leave to exhibit the following document:

By which it appears that, except in the article of rum, the entire interdiction of the colonial trade with the British dependencies would affect only the carrying trade of the United States under any circumstances; but he should presently advert to the state of the trade of a later period, by which it would be seen that, upon the restoration of a general peace, each nation had aspired to its own share, and, in consequence, that of the United States had proportionably diminished. But, at this stage of investigation, it appears from the table furnished, that the United States imported 7,500,000 gallons of rum, exporting only 600,000, left to be consumed in the United States, say 7,000,000, of which 4,000,000 came from the possessions of Great Britain; to which, when we add the vast quantity made in America from molasses, together with the large quantities of ardent spirits distilled from native productions, the mind is filled with amazement and regret at the consumption of this most pernicious article in the United States. If this measure were to be attended with the entire exclusion of this baneful spirit, the man who duly appreciates the morals and health and character of his country, would find an ample indemnity; but, putting considerations of this kind apart, what would be the result in a commercial point of view? If our people will use ardent spirits, the breadstuffs now sent to purchase this article would immediately find a market at home, by being converted into a spirit of a less pernicious kind; so that, in regard to this article, it can produce, were it to be entirely shut out, no serious effect upon our commercial prosperity. The next article, viz., molasses, it will be seen that the colonies of Great Britain produce only 600,000, about one-twelfth part of what we consume; but a large portion of which is manufactured into rum, of which he had already said enough, and proving, he hoped, that whatever deficiency may be produced in that article will be a national benefit. We see, also, that of the article of coffee the United States imported 40,000,000 lbs., only 2,000,000 of which came from the British colonies. But, by the document so often alluded to, it is seen that we exported 24,000,000, leaving to be consumed in the United States only 16,000,000; hence the quantity from the British possessions would attach itself only to the quantity exported. Of sugar we imported 120,000,000, and exported 66,000,000; 12,000,000 of this came from the British possessions. But as we had for exportation 66,000,000, the entire exclusion of that article from the British possessions would act only on the quantity to be exported. Mr. B. said he was thus full on this particular branch of the inquiry, as he had heard an opinion expressed by some, that possibly our prohibitory system might affect the price of those articles, which our habits caused us to enumerate, if not among the necessities, at least among the comforts of life. On the contrary, the facts referred to clearly evince that we are entirely independent of Great Britain; that supplies, far beyond our wants, may be procured elsewhere, and the only diminution will be in the export trade; the extent of which, compared to the tonnage put out of employment by the system of which we complain, is so utterly insignificant as to be undeserving of notice. In addition, it will be a sacrifice of a small portion of shipping interest of one kind, to procure an infinitely greater advantage to another; of which all may participate.

The table marked E (that marked D being intentionally omitted, as embracing a portion of time during the war) discloses the great diminution of the exports of America since the restoration of peace, when, as stated before, each nation had been endeavoring, and had in part succeeded, to enjoy its just proportion of shipping interest. The quantity of rum imported in 1816, was 4,200,000; 2,500,000 of which were imported elsewhere than from the dependencies of Great Britain. 8,000,000 gallons of molasses, 7,500,000 of which are subject to the same remark. 25,000,000 lbs. of coffee were imported, 23,000,000 of which came from other regions than the British islands. 48,000,000 lbs. of sugar were imported; 42,500,000 of which are subject to the same remark. Hence it seems that, in the year 1816, we imported from the possessions of Great Britain 1,700,000 gallons rum, 500,000 gallons molasses, 2,000,000 lbs. coffee, and only 7,500,000 lbs. sugar; and yet, with our own supplies of that article, we were able to export, say from 9,000,000 to 10,000,000 lbs., 5,000,000 more than were wanting for home consumption, if that from Great Britain had been totally excluded. We also see, notwithstanding our increased population, that our importation of rum was minus by 3,000,000 gallons than for any year, on an average, from 1802 to 1812, inclusive. The deficiency must have been supplied by spirits distilled from American productions.

Mr. B. feared, however, he wearied the patience of the Senate with these details, and would proceed, therefore, to the exports from this country to the dependencies in question. It seems that these may be estimated at, say 6,000,000; and the question to be discussed is, what will be the influence of this measure upon the price of the article thus exported. If it be necessary to admit that Great Britain can do and will do without them, then it would be in vain to disguise the fact, that the price of these articles would diminish, and in so far the value impaired, and, by consequence, the agricultural interest injured. But if it were to be revealed from Heaven, that this would be the consequence, still he hoped that agriculturists were prepared, when a just regard to the interests and to the character of their country required it, to make the sacrifice which the emergency called for. He would here take the liberty to state, that he was himself a farmer; that he derived not a cent from any source except what he dug from the earth; that it had not been his fortune to amass money by embarking in any paper speculation whatever; he represented farmers and agriculturists; his interest was like theirs, and he therefore presumed he spoke their sentiments, when he proclaimed his readiness to look across any sacrifice of their interest, when the welfare and dignity of the whole people of the United States demanded it.

It is but due to frankness to say, that they consider the sacrifices heretofore made by them, with a view to preserve our maritime rights, was but illy reciprocated by those whose more immediate interest was concerned. He made no allusion to this subject with a view to awaken unpleasant emotions, nor to open wounds which had already bled enough; for his ardent wish was, that oblivion would forever erase from our history the page which forms a record of these transactions; it was mentioned solely with a view to announce to all whom it might concern, that the same love of country and the same sensibility to its rights continued to form the public sentiment, and that they hold everything as comparatively insignificant when weighed against these high considerations. He had mentioned it also for the further object of warning those who, under the influence, real or pretended, of a jealousy that agriculture was hostile to commerce; a jealousy the less reasonable, as the agriculturists had been at least as prompt to encounter sacrifices as any other portion of the community, of warning such, if at any future time a cry of that kind should be attempted, to look at the history of this measure, in which they would see a security against their sickly apprehensions. The world will see this measure originating from no particular quarter, party, or interest—its foundation is as broad as the empire. In discussing its probable duration, no hopes need be indulged of division. The public sentiment is as undivided as its true interests are indivisible. Shades of difference may indeed exist as to the manner or effect of interposing; but all agree as to the injustice of the policy complained of. But is it true that a sacrifice, to any extent, is to be expected? He thought not; and, for himself, he claimed less credit for the amount of the sacrifice, which, as an agriculturist, he was called on to make, than for the promptitude with which he was prepared to encounter it.

Mr. B., in stating that he thought the sacrifice to agriculture would be trifling, went upon the ground that people must eat—and, if food be for sale, and famine has the means of purchase, it will buy. This, then, presents at once, the fair question—can Great Britain get her supplies of bread, meat, and those things essentially connected with the prosperity, if not the existence, of the colonial possessions? The conversion of the islands from sugar-growing to breadstuff-growing plantations is thrown out of the question—the interest of Great Britain is a sufficient security, that that will not be attempted. From whence, then, is she to get her supplies, if not from the United States? Her North American colonies, except Canada, are themselves importers of breadstuffs; and Canada, at least for the present, raises but little if any, more than is necessary for her own consumption. Great Britain herself has been indebted, for several years, almost for her existence to the supplies of breadstuffs imported from this country. And with all that she could procure, famine has pressed so hard upon her subjects as to drive them into into tumult and disorder. The Peninsula is also indebted to us for her support in part. France, in happier times, might possibly have an excess—in her present calamitous condition, she too feeds upon the over-abundant granary of America. Mr. B. held it therefore as out of the question, to say, these dependencies can be supplied anywhere but from America. If this be true as to breadstuffs, it is no less so as to lumber. She may, indeed, procure some scanty supplies of this article from her North American colonies, but not sufficient to produce any sensible relief, if she be excluded from the United States. The communication before alluded to, from which he had taken many of the facts already stated, presents this subject in a strong light; but, as it was in every gentleman's possession, he would not, as he had enough to do beside, pursue this view of the subject any further, but content himself with referring the Senate to the document. But where can Nova Scotia and New Brunswick get the means of payment, if the supplies are procurable elsewhere than in America. They have nothing but those to sell—nobody buys their plaster but the people of the United States. That they should quarrel with us, is laughable enough, if it did not betray a feeling towards us calculated to excite regret. It is readily admitted, that when a man begs bread, and you give him a stone, you having treated him unkindly, he may be offended; but when we have given bread for stone, it is entirely inconceivable upon what principle they could have interdicted our intercourse; unless, indeed, imitating the example of their superiors, they concluded, that a people who would so far forget what was due to themselves as to pocket one insult, might another. But, to pass on, what will probably be the result of this measure? Great Britain will either retrace her footsteps, and, taking council from her interest, rather than her jealousy, will put our intercourse on an equal footing, and at last find, that true policy consists in an open, liberal, and friendly intercourse. Instead of compromising her honor by this course, she will excite our respect. A magnanimous nation, one who is great and powerful in her resources, can lose nothing by a just and liberal policy—or, if she fail to do this, and pursues her policy, the offspring of other days, she must have an entrepot. But that will be to our advantage, when contrasted with her condition. The presumption is that this entrepot will be in the West Indies. Her trade, being confined to the islands, will expose her seamen to that destructive climate, while ours will be relieved from its consequences by staying there but a short time, and continually returning to the United States. The present is a most fit time for the adoption of the measure. Our convention with Great Britain will terminate on the 4th of July, 1819. Our commercial intercourse must then be established by treaty, or by mutual systems of legislative regulations. The former is greatly preferable: because the latter is continually generating little irritations unfavorable to that peace and friendship which we wish to see forever preserved between this country and Great Britain. But, if it be attempted by treaty, what reasonable hope can be indulged of any better success than heretofore, if you forbear to do anything. Thou fool, said Hercules, help yourself, and then Heaven will assist you. Let us do likewise. She can then no longer withhold from us that justice to which we are entitled, and which it is to be believed, has been withheld, from an anticipation, justified indeed by length of time, that we should make no effort to do ourselves justice. The result of this day, it is to be hoped, will prove, that there are extremes beyond which injustice will not be endured by an American Senate. But if you thus acquiesce in the pretensions of Great Britain, what security have you, that all the minor Powers will not attempt the same policy? Beware of submission! With nations, as with individuals, meekness and crouching rarely stay the hand of insult or injury; it but too often provokes it. The coward not unfrequently is tempted to lay in a stock of reputation, by playing the hero on a subject unwilling to resist, or incapable. These lesser Powers, one of the smallest, begins to inculcate upon us, that we have no equivalent to offer for the West India trade.

It is time then to take a stand. Let your demands be founded in justice. Let your purpose be firm—firm as your everlasting mountains—adopt the broad principle, to treat all nations as they treat you. If they talk about a want of equivalent, unroll the map of your country, and expose to their astonished eyes the boundless extent from the cataract of Niagara to the mouth of the Columbia—tell them of the variety of your climate, and of the fertility of your soil—of its vast productions, so essential to their commerce, and even to their existence; and, when you shall have so done, let them know, it is but the first dawns of your future wealth and power. Let them learn, that your population duplicates itself in twenty years; that it is animated by a spirit of enterprise, which has prompted them to leap the boundaries heretofore prescribed to the reach of the human mind, and in unexplored regions to discover new secrets in the arts and sciences; and that of all this, under Providence, freedom is the creator and preserver; and that it has not entered into the mind of man to conceive the pitch of elevation to which we are destined. When you have told them this, arrogance itself must be dumb.

Mr. B. feared he had already trespassed on their patience. He would, therefore, hurry across the last proposition, which is, that a direct and entire exclusion is better than a half-way system, that of onerous duties. The duties will either prevent the intercourse, or it will not. If it prevent, it approaches, circuitously, what we propose directly. This is an open system. We tell Great Britain our intercourse in this way is forever closed. If, however, the duty system should not stop the intercourse, the object of the bill is lost. It is not revenue we want—of that we already have more than enough—and you tax the people wantonly. It is to do justice to our shipping, and to maintain our maritime rights, that alone will justify the measure. By stopping intercourse at once, this object is effected. By the other, you may lose, and can't win.

The time of its commencement being the 30th September next, is to prevent those speculations and losses which not unfrequently attend any sudden and violent interruption of a long existing commerce.

When Mr. BARBOUR had concluded—

Mr. KING addressed the Chair as follows: Agriculture, manufactures, and foreign commerce, are the true sources of wealth and power of nations; agriculture is the chief and well-rewarded occupation of our people, and yields, in addition to what we want for our use, a great surplus for exportation. Manufactures are making a sure and steady progress; and, with the abundance of food and of raw materials, which the country affords, will, at no distant day, be sufficient, in the principal branches, for our own consumption, and furnish a valuable addition to our exports.

But, without shipping and seamen, the surpluses of agriculture and of manufactures would depreciate on our hands; the cotton, tobacco, bread stuffs, provisions, and manufactures, would turn out to be of little worth, unless we have ships and mariners to carry them abroad, and to distribute them in the foreign markets.

Nations have adopted different theories, as respects the assistance to be derived from navigation; some have been content with a passive foreign commerce—owning no ships themselves, but depending on foreigners and foreign vessels to bring to them their supplies, and to purchase of them their surpluses; while others, and almost every modern nation that borders upon the ocean, have preferred an active foreign trade, carried on, as far as consistent with the reciprocal rights of others, by national ships and seamen.

A dependence upon foreign navigation subjects those who are so dependent, to the known disadvantages arising from foreign wars, and to the expense and risk of the navigation of belligerent nations—the policy of employing a national shipping is, therefore, almost universally approved and adopted; it affords not only a more certain means of prosecuting foreign commerce, but the freight, as well as the profits of trade, are added to the stock of the nation.

The value and importance of national shipping and national seamen, have created among the great maritime Powers, and particularly in England, a strong desire to acquire, by restrictions and exclusions, a disproportionate share of the general commerce of the world.

As all nations have equal rights, and each may claim equal advantages in its intercourse with others, the true theory of international commerce is one of equality, and of reciprocal benefits; this theory gives to enterprise, to skill, and to capital, their just and natural advantages; any other scheme is merely artificial; and so far as it aims at advantages over those who adhere to the open system, it aims at profit at the expense of natural justice.

The colonial system being founded in this vicious theory, has, therefore, proved to be the fruitful source of dissatisfaction, insecurity and war. According to this system, the colonies were depressed below the rank of their fellow subjects, and the fruits of their industry and their intercourse with foreign countries, placed under different regulations from those of the inhabitants of the mother country; it was the denial to Americans of the rights enjoyed by Englishmen, that produced the American Revolution—and the same cause, greatly aggravated, is working the same effect in South America.

Among the the navigators and discoverers of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, the Dutch became highly distinguished, and, by enterprise, economy, and perseverance, made themselves the carriers of other nations, and their country the entrepot of Europe—and it was not until the middle of the fourteenth century, that England passed her navigation act, which had for its object to curtail the navigation of the Dutch and to extend her own.

According to this act, the whole trade and intercourse between England, Asia, Africa, and America, were confined to the shipping and mariners of England; and the intercourse between England and the rest of Europe was placed under regulations which, in a great measure, confined the same to English ships and seamen.

This act was strenuously opposed by the Dutch, and proved the occasion of the obstinate naval Wars that afterwards followed. England was victorious, persisted in her navigation act, and, in the end, broke down the monopoly in trade which the Dutch possessed.

That in vindication of her equal right to navigate the ocean, England should have resisted the monopoly of the Dutch, and freely expended her blood and treasure to obtain her just share of the general commerce, deserved the approbation of all impartial men. But, having accomplished this object, that she should herself aim at, and in the end establish, the same exclusive system, and on a more extended scale, is neither consistent with her own laudable principles, nor compatible with the rights of others; who, relatively to her monopoly now, are in the like situation towards England in which England was towards the Dutch, when she asserted and made good her rights against them.

By the English act of navigation, the trade of the colonies is restrained to the dominions of the mother country, and none but English ships are allowed to engage in it.

So long as colonies are within such limits as leave to other nations a convenient resort to foreign markets for the exchange of the goods which they have to sell, for those they want to buy, so long this system is tolerable; but if the power of a State enables it to increase the number of its colonies and dependent territories, so that it becomes the mistress of the great military and commercial stations throughout the globe, this extension of dominion, and the consequent monopoly of commerce, seem to be incompatible with, and necessarily to abridge the equal rights of other States.

In the late debates in the English Parliament, the Minister, in the House of Lords, stated "that instead of seventeen thousand men, employed abroad in 1791, forty-one thousand were then (1816) required, exclusive of those that were serving in France and in India. That England now has forty-three principal colonies, in all of which troops are necessary; that sixteen of these principal colonies were acquired since 1791, and six of them had grown into that rank from mere colonial dependencies." And, in the House of Commons, the Minister, alluding to the acquisitions made during the war with France, said "that England had acquired what, in former days, would have been thought romance—she had acquired the keys of every great military station."

Thus, the commercial aggrandizement of England has become such, as the men who protested against monopoly, and devised the navigation act to break it down, could never have anticipated; and it may, ere long, concern other nations to inquire whether laws and principles, applicable to the narrow limits of English dominion and commerce, at the date of the navigation act, when colonies and commerce, and even navigation itself, were comparatively in their infancy; laws and principles aimed against monopoly, and adopted to secure to England her just share in the general commerce and navigation of the world, ought to be used by England, to perpetuate in her own hands a system equally as exclusive, and far more comprehensive, than that which she was the chief agent to abolish.

Our commercial system is an open one—our ports and our commerce are free to all—we neither possess, nor desire to possess, colonies; nor do we object that others should possess them, unless thereby the general commerce of the world be so abridged, that we are restrained in our intercourse with foreign countries wanting our supplies, and furnishing in return, those which we stand in need of.

But, it is not to the colonial system, but to a new principle, which in modern times, has been incorporated with those of the navigation act, that we now object. According to this act, no direct trade or intercourse can be carried on between a colony and a foreign country; but by the free port bill, passed in the present reign, the English contraband trade, which had been long pursued, in violation of Spanish laws, between English and Spanish colonies, was sanctioned and regulated by an English act of Parliament; and, since the independence of the United States, England has passed laws, opening an intercourse and trade between her West India colonies and the United States, and, excluding the shipping of the United States, has confined the same to English ships and seamen; departing by this law not only from the principles of the navigation act, which she was at liberty to do, by opening a direct intercourse between the colonies and a foreign country, but controlling, which she had no authority to do, the reciprocal rights of the United States to employ their own vessels to carry it on.*

Colonies being parts of the nation, are subject to its regulations; but, when an intercourse and trade are opened between colonies and a foreign country, the foreign country becomes a party, and has a reciprocal claim to employ its own vessels equally in the intercourse and trade with such colonies, as with any other part of the nation to which they belong.

Governments owe it to the trust confided to them, carefully to watch over, and by all suitable means to promote, the general welfare; and while, on account of a small or doubtful inconvenience, they will not disturb a beneficial intercourse between their people and a foreign country, they ought not to omit the interposition of their corrective authority, whenever an important public interest is invaded, or the national reputation affected. "It is good not to try experiments in States, unless the necessity be urgent, or the utility evident; and well to beware, that it be the reformation that draweth on the change, and not the desire of change that pretendeth the reformation."

In this case, the importance of the reformation is seen and acknowledged by every one, and the delay that has occurred in the making of it may call for explanation.

We are unable to state with accuracy the tonnage and seamen employed before the Revolution, in the trade between the territories of the United States and the other English colonies, but it is known to have been a principal branch of the American navigation.

The colonies that England has since acquired from France, Spain, and Holland, together with the increased population of the old colonies, require more ships and seamen to be employed in the trade now than were engaged in it before the independence of the United States.

Without reference to the tonnage and trade between the United States and the English West India colonies, during the late wars between England and France, which, by reason of the suspension of the English navigation act, and the neutrality of the United States, will afford no standard by which the tonnage and trade of peace can be ascertained, the present custom-house returns are the best documents that we can consult upon this subject. According to a late report from the Department of the Treasury, the tonnage employed in this trade during the year 1816, which may be taken as an average, amounted to one hundred and two thousand tons, requiring between five and six thousand seamen. There may be some error in this return, though we are not able to detect it; the magnitude and importance of the shipping and seamen engaged in this trade, will be more readily understood by comparison than otherwise. The tonnage thus employed exceeds the whole tonnage employed by the English East India Company in its trade with Asia; is nearly a moiety of the American and English tonnage employed between the United States and England, and her possessions in Europe; is equal to the American tonnage employed between the United States and England, and is almost an eighth part of the whole registered tonnage of the United States.

To the loss of profits, which would accrue from an equal participation in this trade, may be added the loss of an equal share of the freights made by the vessels engaged in it; the amount whereof must be equal to two millions of dollars, annually. Other advantages are enjoyed by England, by the possession of the exclusive navigation between the United States and her colonies, and between them and England. Freights are made by English vessels between England and the United States, between them and the English colonies, as well as between those colonies and England. English voyages are thus made on the three sides of the triangle, while those of the United States are confined to one side of it, that between the United States and England.

But the money value of this great portion of our navigation, claimed and hitherto enjoyed by England, although an object that deserves the * England alone excludes our vessels and seamen from the trade opened between her West India colonies and the United States. In the same trade between the United States and the colonies of France, Spain, Holland, Denmark and Sweden, our vessels and seamen are alike employed, as those of the parent countries, respectively.

The Navigation Bill.

public protection is not the most important view in which the same should be considered by the Senate. We must learn wisdom from past times; and while the experience of the father is too often lost on the son, this ought not to be the case in the affairs of nations, which living from age to age, and profiting by long experience, should become wiser as they grow older. The present condition of nations, and especially that of the inhabitants of our own continent, merits our watchful attention, and admonish us to cherish our national resources, and seasonably to devise, and perseveringly to build up, those establishments, that our present safety demands, and which may be commensurate with our future destiny.

Justice and moderation, which we confidently hope may preside over and guide our public councils, have not been found to be a sufficient armor for the defence of nations. "Wisdom, in the ancient mythology, was represented as armed, because experience had proved that good examples and noble precepts fail of their efficacy, unaccompanied by a power to enforce them." To defend ourselves, our houses, our harbors, and our commerce, from foreign aggression and violence, a navy is acknowledged to be necessary. From the land side we are safe—against dangers from the ocean, a navy will prove to be our cheap, our sure, and most efficient defence.

Although a subject of doubt heretofore, this truth is now so well understood, and so universally admitted, that it would be to mispend the time of the Senate to enter into its development.

An efficient navy never has existed, and cannot exist, without a commercial marine; and the maritime history of Europe, which abounds with instruction on this subject, demonstrates this political truth, that the naval power of every nation is in proportion to its commercial shipping. Money may build ships, but the navigation of the great ocean only can make seamen, and it is in connexion with this view of the subject, that the exclusion of our shipping and seamen from the navigation between the United States and the colonies of England, derives its chief importance.

The prosperity and safety of nations are promoted and established, by institutions early and wisely adapted to these ends. A navy being such an institution, and our experience having proved its importance, it has become the duty of Congress to adopt and to enforce those regulations that are necessary to its efficient establishment. None more efficacious can be devised, than such as encourage and increase the shipping and the mariners of the country, and, for this purpose, exclude those of a foreign Power from a principal branch of our own navigation; a branch that now educates and holds ready for service in the navy of England, and which would educate and hold ready for service in our own Navy, were the United States, instead of England, in the prosecution thereof, a body of several thousand seamen.

But, by passing this act, shall we not cut ourselves off from those supplies which our habits have rendered indispensable? Will not the English colonial markets, for supplies hitherto purchased among us, and imported to them, be lost, and shall we increase our navigation by adopting the law?

The documents that have been communicated to the Senate, by the chairman of the Committee of Foreign Relations, (Mr. BARBOUR,) satisfactorily prove that we are independent of the English colonies for a supply of sugar and coffee for our own consumption; our annual re-exportation of these articles exceeding the quantity of them annually imported from the English colonies; and, in respect to rum, the other article imported from these colonies, its exclusion will be the loss to England of its best and almost only market; and its place will be readily supplied by other foreign rum and by brandy; or, which is more probable, by domestic spirits distilled from grain.

The exports from the United States to the English West India colonies have been estimated at four millions of dollars annually; the problem has been disputed ever since the independence of the United States, and still remains to be solved, whether these colonies could obtain from any other quarter the supplies received from the United States. To make this experiment effectually, further restrictions and regulations may become necessary, which it is not now deemed expedient to propose. If the question be decided in the negative, the supplies will be continued from the United States, and our shipping will be benefited.

If the articles heretofore supplied from this country can be obtained elsewhere, we must find out other markets for our exports, or the labor employed in preparing them must be applied to some other branch of industry. We have the power, and hereafter it may become our policy, as it is that of other countries, to resort to a regulation, the effect of which would go far to balance any disadvantage arising from the loss of the English colonial markets. We import annually upwards of six millions of gallons of West India rum, more than half of which comes from the English colonies; we also import, every year, nearly seven millions of gallons of molasses: as every gallon of molasses yields, by distillation, a gallon of rum; the rum imported, added to that distilled from imported molasses, is probably equal to twelve million of gallons, which enormous quantity is chiefly consumed by citizens of the United States.

If the importation of rum and molasses, for distillation, be prohibited, it would require four millions of bushels of grain for distillation to supply an equal quantity of ardent spirits; and, in this way, our agriculture would be indemnified for any loss it might suffer by losing the English colonial markets.

As respects the timber and lumber trade, including staves and woods, in all the forms in which we prepare them for exportation, should no foreign markets be found to supply those which, by the imposition of high duties, we have lost in England, and those which, by the passing of this bill, we may lose in the English and India colonies, those who are engaged in this precarious and, generally, ill-paid and unprofitable business, will hereafter confine their supplies to our domestic wants, which constantly increase, and to the foreign markets, that are neither affected by English duties, nor the bill before us.

The timber of the country is becoming scarce, and more and more an object of public concern. The forests upon the frontier of the ocean, and on the great rivers leading to it, are nearly destroyed. In other countries, and even in Russia, the improvident waste of their timber, especially in the neighborhood of their great iron works, is becoming a national inconvenience.

Masts, spars, pine and oak timber, fit for naval purposes, and for the numerous uses for which timber and wood are wanted, were far more abundant, and of better quality formerly, and within the memory of men now living, than they are at the present day; and a little more care and economy in the use of our timber even now, will confer an important benefit on posterity. The probability, however, is that, as respects our valuable timber, we shall not want foreign markets for all we have to spare.

As a general rule it is correct, that every person should be free to follow the business he may prefer; since, by the freedom, sagacity, and enterprise of individuals, the general welfare is commonly promoted. There are, however, exceptions to this principle; and, as general rules affect unequally individual concerns, and measures adopted for the common welfare may sometimes interfere with private pursuits, from the nature and end of society, the latter must give way for and yield to the former; and in this case the general welfare, and the interest that all have in the encouragement and protection of the shipping and seamen of the country, take precedence over the private and individual interests of persons, whose occupations may thereby be somewhat affected.

Touching the last point, whether we shall increase our own navigation and seamen by passing the bill, it may be observed: If England meet us in the temper that we hope she may do, and enter into a reciprocally beneficial arrangement concerning the navigation of the two countries, our shipping will acquire thereby a portion of the carrying trade now exclusively possessed by England. If she persist in her exclusive system, and thus compel us to meet restriction by restriction, we shall not be losers by this course, but shall ultimately be gainers. According to the English navigation act, as well as the act of Parliament, that departs from it, and opens an intercourse between the English colonies and the United States, we are excluded from any share in the navigation between these colonies and the United States. No notice is taken of the occasional relaxation of the latter act, because, by the double competition created by the Americans themselves, as sellers and buyers in the English colonies, the intercourse is probably disadvantageous, rather than beneficial to us. According to the permanent law, English shipping only brings to us her West India supplies, and takes in return the articles wanted in these colonies. If English shipping be no longer employed in this service, and the articles formerly sent to these colonies are exported to other markets, or the supplies received from them are sought for, and imported into the United States from other places, the vessels of the United States will be employed in this service, and so the navigation and mariners of the country will be encouraged and increased.

It will be found, as it has been heretofore, that new markets will be discovered, as well to purchase our surpluses as to supply our wants, should those be lost with which we have formerly had intercourse.

But why has a measure of this importance been so long deferred? The explanation which this question requires cannot be made without some reference to the history of our communications with England since the peace of 1783, as well as to the views and policy of men and parties that have in succession influenced our public affairs.

As, according to the powers of England, notwithstanding the acknowledgment of our independence, neither trade nor intercourse could be carried on between the United States and her dominions, it became necessary after the treaty of peace to pass some act whereby this trade and intercourse might be prosecuted, a bill for this purpose was introduced into the House of Commons by the Administration which concluded the treaty of peace with the United States. The general scope and provisions of the bill correspond with the liberal principles which were manifested in the treaty of peace. They plainly show that the authors of this bill understood that the true basis of the trade and intercourse between nations is reciprocity of benefit; a foundation on which alone the friendly intercourse between men and nations can be permanently established. The preamble of this bill declares "that it was highly expedient that the intercourse between Great Britain and the United States should be established on the most enlarged principles of reciprocal benefit to both countries;" and as, from the distance between them, it would be a considerable time before a treaty of commerce, placing their trade and intercourse on a permanent foundation, could be concluded, the bill, for the purpose of a temporary regulation thereof, provided, that American vessels should be admitted into the ports of Great Britain, as those of other independent States, and that their cargoes should be liable to the same duties only as the same merchandise would be subject to if the same were the property of British subjects, and imported in British vessels; and, further, that the vessels of the United States should be admitted into the English plantations and colonies in America, with any articles the growth or manufacture of the United States, and with liberty to export from such colonies and plantations to the United States any merchandise whatsoever, subject to the same duties only as if the property of British subjects, and imported or exported in British vessels; allowing, also, the same bounties, drawbacks, and exemptions, on goods exported from Great Britain to the United States in American vessels, as on the like exportations in British vessels to the English colonies and plantations.

The persons benefitted by the English exclusive system of trade and navigation were put in motion by this bill, which was earnestly opposed, and, after a variety of discussion, postponed or rejected. About this period Mr. Pitt, who had supported this bill in the House of Commons, resigned his office of Chancellor of the Exchequer, as his colleagues in Lord Shelburne's administration had before done. The coalition administration that succeeded introduced a new bill, which became a law, vesting in the King and Council authority to make such temporary regulations of the American navigation and trade as should be deemed expedient.

Sundry Orders in Council were accordingly made, whereby a trade and intercourse in American and English vessels between the United States and Great Britain were allowed; and, with the exception of fish oil, and one or two other articles, the produce of the United States, imported into Great Britain, was admitted freely, or subject to the duties payable on the like articles imported in English vessels from the American colonies.

An intercourse and a trade in enumerated articles were also opened between the United States and the English West India colonies, but with a proviso, (the principle whereof is still maintained against us,) whereby American vessels were excluded, and the whole trade confined to English vessels.

After a periodical renewal of these orders for several years, the regulations that they contained were adopted by, and became an act of, Parliament. This act was afterwards modified, and rendered conformable to the provision of Mr. Jay's treaty, the commercial articles of which expired in the year 1803—not long after which date England passed a new act of Parliament concerning the American navigation and trade. This act maintains the exclusion of American vessels from the intercourse between the United States and the English colonies, and confines the same, as former acts and Orders in Council had done, to English vessels; it repealed the settlement of duties pursuant to Mr. Jay's treaty; and, giving up the policy of the enlarged and liberal system of intercourse which had been proposed in Mr. Pitt's bill, it repealed such parts of all former acts and orders as admitted the productions of the United States, either freely, or, on paying the same duties only as were payable on the like articles imported from the English colonies and plantations; and placed all articles the produce of the United States, imported in American vessels, on the same footing as the like articles imported in foreign ships from other foreign countries. This new footing of our trade with England, the importance whereof is well understood by those who are engaged in supplying her markets with masts, spars, timber, naval stores, and pot and pearl ashes, may be regarded as decisive evidence of a complete change of policy concerning the American trade and intercourse—which, however unsatisfactory, as respected the colonial trade, has become more so by the foregoing provision of this act of Parliament.

The policy that manifested itself in the treaty of our independence, and which is seen in the bill to regulate the trade and intercourse between England and the United States, prepared by the Administration that made the Treaty of Peace, was to unite in a firm bond of friendship, by the establishment of trade and intercourse on the solid basis of reciprocal benefit, a people politically separate, living under different governments, but, having a common origin, a common language, a common law, and kindred blood; circumstances so peculiar, as not to be found between any other nation. Instead of this policy, one of a different sort is preferred—one that England has a right to prefer; and against the many evils of which, we must protect ourselves as well as we are able to do. The intricate, countervailing, and perplexing code of commercial intercourse, founded in jealousy, and the rival establishments and pursuits of the Powers of Europe bordering upon, and constantly interfering with, each other, has been adopted and applied to the United States—a people, agricultural more than manufacturing or commercial, placed in another quarter of the globe, cultivating, and proposing to others, an open system of trade and intercourse; and herein, as in many other important discriminations, differing from the nations of Europe, and therefore not fit subjects to which these restrictive and jealous regulations are applicable.

Our policy is, and ever has been, a different one. We desire peace with all nations; and the wars of maritime Europe have taught us that a free system of trade and intercourse would be the best means of preserving it.

With these principles as our guide, at the negotiation of the Treaty of Peace in 1783, our Ministers were authorized to conclude a treaty of commerce with England on this basis; but no treaty was concluded. Afterwards, and when a temporary trade and intercourse were opened by England, looking, as we supposed, to a treaty of Commerce, Congress instructed Messrs. Adams, Franklin, and Jefferson, to renew the overture of a treaty of commerce, which was done through the English Ambassador at Paris, in the year 1784; but no correspondent disposition being shown by England, this second overture failed.

The interest and prejudice of those who were benefitted by the monopolies and exclusive system of England, were opposed to any treaty with this country, on the principle of reciprocal advantage. The political writers of that day, under the influence of these partial views, or not sufficiently appreciating the true theory of commerce, contended that it would be folly to enter into engagements by which England might not wish to be bound in future; that such engagements would be gratuitous; as, according to their interpretation, Congress possessed no power, under the confederation, to enforce any stipulation into which they might enter; that no treaty that could be made would suit all the States; if any were necessary, they should be made with the States separately; but that none was necessary; and those who talked of liberality and reciprocity in commercial affairs, were either without argument or knowledge; that the object of England was, not reciprocity and liberality, but to raise as many sailors and as much shipping as possible.*

This unequal footing of our foreign commerce, and the language made use of by England at this juncture, served still more to increase the public discontent; especially as it was plainly avowed that England ought to render the trade with us as exclusively advantageous to herself as her power would enable her to do. Congress having no power, under the Confederation, to impose countervailing and other corrective regulations of trade, the States separately attempted to establish regulations upon this subject. But, as a part only of the States joined in this measure, and as the laws that were passed for this purpose differed from each other, the experiment completely failed.

In this condition of our navigation and trade, subject to foreign restrictions and exclusion, without a power at home to countervail and check the same, Congress resolved to make another effort to conclude a commercial treaty with England. For this purpose Mr. Adams, since President of the United States, was appointed, and went to England. Mr. Adams resided in England for several years; but found and left the Government unchanged, and equally as before disinclined to make with us a treaty of commerce.

This further disappointment, with the depreciating condition of our navigation and trade, joined to the embarrassment of the public finances, produced what no inferior pressure could have done; it produced the General Convention of 1787, that formed the Constitution of the United States.

Had England entered into a liberal treaty of commerce with the United States, this convention would not have been assembled. Without so intending it, the adherence of England to her unequal and exclusive system of trade and navigation, gave to this country a Constitution; and the countervailing and equalizing bill now before the Senate, arising from the same cause, may assist us in establishing and extending those great branches of national wealth and power, which we have such constant and urgent motives to encourage.

The establishment of the Constitution of the United States was coeval with the commencement of the French Revolution. The sessions of the General Convention at Philadelphia, and of the Assembly of Notables at Paris, were in the same year.

Laws were passed by the first Congress assembled under the new Constitution, partially to correct the inequality of our navigation and trade with foreign nations; and a small discrimination in duties of impost and tonnage was made for this purpose.

Afterwards, in the year 1794, a number of resolutions on the subject of navigation and trade were moved in the House of Representatives, by a distinguished member of that body. These resolutions had a special reference to the refusal of England to enter into an equal commercial treaty with us, aimed at countervailing her exclusive system. Other and more direct resolutions, bearing on England, were also proposed by other members, and referred to the inexecution of the Treaty of Peace, and to the recent captures of American vessels, by English cruisers, in the American seas.

The policy of these resolutions was doubted; they were therefore strenuously opposed, and the extraordinary mission of Mr. Jay to England suspended their further discussion.

The French Revolution had by this time become the subject of universal attention. War had broken out between France and England. The avowed policy of our own Government to avoid war, and to adhere to a system of neutrality, was much questioned; and for a time it was matter of great uncertainty whether the country would support the neutrality recommended by the President.

The universal dissatisfaction, on account of the commercial system of England, the inexecution of the articles of peace, the numerous captures by orders of the French Government, of our vessels, employed in a trade strictly neutral, combined with our friendly recollections of the services of France, and our good wishes in favor of the effort she professed to be making to establish a free constitution, constituted a crisis most difficult and important.

It was in these circumstances, that President WASHINGTON nominated Mr. Jay as Envoy to England. The Senate confirmed the nomination, and the immediate effect was, the suspension of the further discussion of the important resolutions before the House of Representatives.

England seems never to have duly appreciated the true character and importance of this extraordinary measure. France well understood and resented it. Mr. Jay was received with civility, and concluded a treaty with England on all the points of his instructions. When published, it met with great opposition. The article respecting the West India trade, had been excluded from the treaty by the Senate, by reason of the inadmissible condition or proviso that was coupled with it—with this exception, it was finally ratified by the President.

Although the treaty did not come up to the expectation of all, in addition to the satisfactory arrangements, concerning English debts, the unlawful capture and condemnation of our vessels, and the delivery of the ports, points of very great importance, it contained articles regulating the trade, navigation, and maritime rights of the two countries. No treaty that could have been made with England would, in the highly excited temper of the country, have satisfied it. But, to those whose object it was to prevent the country from taking part in the war between France and England, and to prevail upon it to adhere to a system of impartial neutrality; who, moreover, believed, that the safety, and even liberties of the country were concerned in the adoption of this course, the treaty proved a welcome auxiliary.

It suspended the further agitation of difficult and angry topics of controversy with England; it enabled the Government to persist in, and to maintain, the system of neutrality which had been recommended by the Father of his Country—a policy, the correctness and benefits of which, whatever may have been the disagreement of opinion among the public men of those times, that will now scarcely be doubted.

During the continuance of this treaty, further though ineffectual attempts were made to establish a satisfactory intercourse with the English colonies in the West Indies, and, likewise, to place the subject of impressment on a mutually safe and equitable footing.

The commercial articles of this treaty expired in 1804, no proposal having been made to renew them. A subsequent negotiation took place, but nothing was definitively concluded. The Peace of Amiens was of short duration. Another war took place between France and England; no maritime treaty existed between the United States and England; and the manner in which England exercised her power on the ocean; the great interruption of the navigation and trade of neutral nations; the numerous captures of their ships and cargoes under the retaliatory decrees and orders of France and England, with other vexatious occurrences, revived the former angry feelings towards England, and greatly contributed to the late war with that nation.

This war was closed not long after the conclusion of the general peace in Europe; and the Treaty of Ghent was followed by a meagre commercial convention, made at London, and limited, in its duration, to a few years only.

Neither the spirit of the negotiation, nor the scope of the articles, afford any evidence that England is inclined to treat with this country on the only principle on which a commercial treaty with her can be desirable. Her decision on this point seems to be beyond question, as our latest communications inform us that her ancient system will not be changed; and, in case we are dissatisfied with its operation, that England has no objection to our taking any such measures concerning the same, as we may deem expedient—an intimation that puts an end to further overtures on our part. Such is the explanation why the measure now proposed has been so long deferred.

During the Confederation, Congress were without power to adopt it.

The treaty concluded by Mr. Jay, in 1794, the relaxation of the navigation and colonial laws, during the war between France and England, and the advantages derived from our neutral trade while this war continued, rendered the measure inexpedient during this period.

And the expectation since entertained that a more enlarged and equal treaty of commerce and navigation, applicable, in its provisions, to peace as well as war, might be substituted in place of the present commercial convention, has hitherto suspended the interference of Congress.

This expectation must be given up; England has apprized us of her decision to adhere to her ancient and exclusive system of trade and navigation, and the only alternative before us, is to submit to the regulation of our own navigation by England, or to interpose the authority of the Constitution to countervail the same. There can be no hesitation in the choice.

The bill before the Senate, is in nothing unfriendly towards England—it is merely a commercial regulation, to which we are even invited; a measure strictly of self-defence, and intended to protect the legitimate resources of our own country from being any longer made use of, not as they should be, for our benefit, but to increase and strengthen the resources and power of a foreign nation.

The time is propitious; causes that formerly prevented the union of opinions in favor of this measure no longer exist; the Old World is at peace; and each nation is busily employed in repairing the waste of war, by cultivating the arts, and extending the blessings of peace—England has come out of the most portentous war that Europe has ever suffered, not only unbroken, but with increased power.

Her agriculture, manufactures, and commerce, were cherished; were without interruption, and increased, while those of neighboring nations were suspended, interrupted, or destroyed.

Her colonies and dependent territories, have been greatly enlarged, at the expense of her enemies; and regions, with which we and others once had trade and intercourse, having fallen under the dominion of England, are now closed against us.

We have no other questions depending with England, except those concerning impressment* and the fisheries,† and their settlement, can, in no manner, be affected by the passing of this act.

* With the English laws of allegiance and impressment we have no other concern than to exempt our citizens from their application. We do not desire the service of English seamen, and England should be the last to seize our citizens and force them into her service. She disclaims this purpose, but persists in a practice, to discover and impress her own seamen, that, unavoidably, subjects ours to her violence.—Whatever her rights may be, they should be so used as not to hurt ours. This is a precept of universal justice—a regulation may be devised, that if not perfect in every case, would be so generally correct, that, considering the difficulty of the subject, it ought to be satisfactory.

† As regards the fisheries, those of the ocean, not within the territorial limits of any nation, are free to all men, who have not renounced their rights; those on the coasts and bays of the provinces, conquered in America, from France, were acquired by the common sword, and mingled blood, of Americans and English-

England is a great and illustrious nation, having attained to this pre-eminence by generous and successful efforts, in breaking down the civil and religious bondage of former ages. Her patriots, her scholars, and her statesmen, have adorned her history, and offer models for the imitation of others.

We are the powerful descendants of England, desiring perpetual friendship, and the uninterrupted interchange of kind offices and reciprocal benefits with her. We have demonstrated, in circumstances the most critical, constant and persevering evidence of this disposition. We still desire the impartial adjustment of our mutual intercourse, and the establishment of some equitable regulations, by which our personal and maritime rights may be secure from arbitrary violation. A settlement that, instead of endless collision and dispute, may be productive of concord, good humor, and friendship: and it depends on England whether such is to be the relation subsisting between us.

If this bill become a law, it must be followed up by ulterior provisions, if requisite, to give to it complete effect. Either the intercourse must be reciprocally beneficial, or it must not be suffered to exist.

Mr. MACON spoke in support of the bill; after which—

The question, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?" was taken, and determined in the affirmative—yeas 32, nays 1, as follows:

into the service of the United States, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. DICKERSON, from the joint committee, appointed to take into consideration what business is necessary to be acted upon before the close of the present session, made a report, which was read.

Mr. LACOCK, from the committee to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making further appropriations for the construction of the Cumberland road," reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing John Taylor to be placed on the list of Navy pensioners," were discharged from the further consideration thereof, and it was referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. CRITTENDEN, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," reported the same with an amendment; which was read; and, on motion by Mr. CRITTENDEN, the Committee on the Judiciary, to whom was referred the memorial of John B. Colvin, respecting the future publication of the laws of the United States, and also the memorial of Jonathan Elliot, praying the patronage of Congress to the publication of Domestic State Papers, were discharged from the further consideration thereof respectively.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. KING, on the 3d instant; and the same having been amended, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury do report to the Senate the sum of the funded debt of the United States, bearing an interest of seven, six, and three per cent.; distinguishing the amount of each that has been paid by the subscribers towards the capital of the Bank of the United States; distinguishing also the sums of the respective species of funded debt paid on account of the several instalments to the bank; stating the sums and species of funded debt sold by the bank; how much thereof was purchased or redeemed by the United States; how much has been sold without the United States; and how much is now held by the bank.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Narcissus Broutin, and others," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time, as amended, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act concerning the Territory of Alabama," was read a third time, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act making appropriation for the support of Government for the year 1818," was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Francis Henderson, was read the second time.

be published by Adam Scybert, of Philadelphia; and the resolution was read, and passed to the second reading.

The bill concerning navigation was read a third time; and having been amended by unanimous consent, on the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—years 31, nays 2, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Campbell, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Lacock, Macon, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Eppes and Wilson.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be, "An act concerning navigation."

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the memorial of the American Bible Society, praying the privilege of importing paper free of duty, and the memorial of the Philadelphia Bible Society, praying the remission of all duties on stereotype plates already imported, and that they be permitted to import the sacred scriptures in foreign languages, free of duty; and also the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, praying certain amendments to the act incorporating said bank, were discharged from the further consideration thereof respectively.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the 'Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein described,' together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Foreign Relations; and, on motion by Mr. BARBOUR, the bill, together with the amendments, were committed to the Committee on Foreign Relations further to consider and report thereon.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah Dewees, relict and widow of William Dewees, deceased, and the heirs and legal representatives of the said William Dewees," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Gad Worthington," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill to repeal part of the act, entitled "An act to provide for surveying the coasts of the United States," was read the second time.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the houses of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher and Company, Thomas Clifford and Son, and Thomas Clifford of Philadelphia, and Charles Wigram of Baltimore," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Rodgers," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain friendly Creek Indians, of the mixed blood," was read the second time, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for paying to the State of Indiana three per cent. of the net proceeds arising from the sales of the United States lands within the same;" and, on motion by Mr. CAMPBELL that the Senate disagree thereto, it was determined in the affirmative—years 22, nays 8, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Campbell, Crittenden, Daggett, Dickerson, Eppes, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Johnson, King, Macon, Morrill, Morrow, Otis, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Williams of Mississippi, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Fromentin, Noble, Ruggles, Sanford, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

So it was Resolved, That the Senate disagree to said amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to increase the compensation of certain judges of the courts of the United States; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Monday next.

On motion by Mr. NOBLE, the Committee on Pensions, who were instructed by a resolution of the Senate, to inquire into the expediency of placing Adam Crum on the pension list, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of General Moses Porter," reported the same, with amendments; which were read.

The Senate adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, April 6.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah Dewees, relict and widow of William Dewees, deceased, and the heirs and legal representatives of the said William Dewees, reported the same without amendment.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Rodgers," also reported it without amendment.

Mr. FROMENTIN presented the petition of Hiacynth Laclotte, of the city of New Orleans, praying the remission of the duties charged on the plate and engravings imported from France, representing a view of the battle of the 8th of January, 1815, in defence of the city of New Orleans; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to change the name of the district of Erie, in the State of Ohio," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. RUGGLES presented the petition of John

Mr. VAN DYKE, from the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Smith P. Slocum, of Pawtuxet, in the State of Rhode Island, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the report of the petitioner ought not to be granted. The report and resolution were read.

The bill, authorizing the disposal of certain lots of public ground in the city of New Orleans and town of Mobile, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the memorial of John Hall, praying that Congress may pass a law authorizing the allowance of one hundred and fifty doubloons in the settlement of his accounts at the Navy Department, which he states to have been robbed from him; and the resolution having been amended, by striking out the word "not," it was resolved that the prayer of the petitioner ought to be granted; and the Committee of Claims were instructed to report a bill accordingly.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major Loring Austin, and George R. Wells;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Jacob Brown;" a bill, entitled "An act to establish a port of entry and delivery at Cape Vincent, at the fork of Lake Ontario, and the head of the river St. Lawrence;" and also, a bill, entitled "An act to abolish the port of delivery established at the mouth of Slade's Creek, in the State of North Carolina;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed the bill, which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the 'Act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,' with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the last mentioned bill; and it was referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The four bills last brought up for concurrence were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Jacob Brown," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major Loring Austin and George R. Wells," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the same committee.

The bill, entitled "An act to establish a port of entry and delivery at Cape Vincent, at the fork of Lake Ontario, and the head of the river St.

Lawrence," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill, entitled "An act to abolish the port of delivery established at the mouth of Slade's Creek, in the State of North Carolina," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the last mentioned committee.

Agreeably to the order of the day, the Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to increase the compensation of certain Judges of the Courts of the United States; and Mr. BARBOUR was requested to take the Chair.

On motion by Mr. FROMENTIN, to fill the blank in line 6, with "five thousand," being the yearly compensation to the Chief Justice, it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 25, nays 4, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Morrow, Otis, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Macon, Morrill, Talbot, and Wilson.

On motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Mississippi, to fill the blank in line 33, with "three thousand six hundred," being the contemplated compensation to the judge of the district of Louisiana, it was determined in the negative—yeas 5, nays 27, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Fromentin, Gaillard, Johnson Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Campbell, Daggett, Dickerson, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, King, Lacoek, Leake, Macon, Morrill, Morrow, Otis, Roberts, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, and Wilson.

The compensations of the judges of the districts of Massachusetts, of the two districts of New York, the two districts of Pennsylvania, the district of Maryland, of Virginia, of North Carolina, of South Carolina, of Georgia, of Kentucky, and of Tennessee, was fixed at two thousand a year; and that of the judges of the districts of Maine, of New Hampshire, of Rhode Island, of Connecticut, of Vermont, of New Jersey, of Delaware, of Ohio, of Indiana, of Mississippi, and the territorial judges, at one thousand five hundred dollars each, all to commence in July next; in which shape the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The resolution authorizing a subscription for five hundred copies of Statistical Annals, proposed to be published by Adam Seybert, was read the second time, and referred to a select committee, to consist of five members, with instructions to inquire also into the propriety of subscribing for the work of Timothy Pitkin; and Messrs. BARBOUR, KING, DAGGETT, HUNTER, and DICKERSON, were appointed the committee.

payment thereon; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, pursuant to instructions, reported a bill for the relief of John Hall, late a major of marines; and the bill was read, and passed to the second reading.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of certain commissioned officers of the Navy, under the rank of commanders, and the memorial of certain officers of the Marine Corps attached to the Mediterranean squadron of date the 17th January, 1817; and in concurrence therewith, the Committee on Naval Affairs were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

TUESDAY, April 7.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson;" a bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States;" a bill, entitled "An act respecting the organization of the Army, and for other purposes;" and also, a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Work," in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The four bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill, entitled "An act respecting the organization of the Army, and for other purposes," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Work," was read the second time, by unanimous consent, and referred to the same committee.

Mr. LACOCK presented the petition of Samuel Smith, attorney for Elisha Allen, an ensign, who acted as wagon-master to a brigade, praying additional allowance of pay therefor; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

Mr. TART, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act authorizing John Taylor to be placed on the list of navy pensioners," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," reported the same without amendment.

Whereupon, on motion by Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee,

Resolved, That the Senate disagree to the said amendment, and ask a conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, Mr. LACOCK, and Mr. TAYLOR, were appointed the managers at the said conference, on the part of the Senate.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of George Pearson," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. MORROW, from the same committee, to whom was referred the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office; and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military tract," reported the same without amendment; and the Senate concurred therein.

The bill for the relief of John Hall, late major of marines, was read the second time.

The bill to suspend for a limited time, the sale or forfeiture of lands, for failure in completing the payment thereon, was read the second time.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on the Militia, to whom was referred a resolution respecting the expediency of setting apart and appropriating the dividends which shall arise from the shares held by the Government in the Bank of the United States, to the manufacture of arms and equipments for arming and equipping the whole body of the militia of the United States; and, on motion by Mr. MACON, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in July next.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee on Pensions, to whom was referred the petition of Smith P. Slocum, of Pawtuxet, in the State of Rhode Island; and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to alter and establish the boundary line between the State of Mississippi and the Alabama Territory; and, on motion by Mr. LEAKE, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in July next.

The bill to increase the compensation of certain judges of the courts of the United States, was reported by the committee correctly engrossed, and the blanks having been filled, on the question, "Shall this bill pass?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 19, nays 14, as follows:

So it was, Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be, "An act to fix the compensation of certain judges of the courts of the United States."

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments being agreed to, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress;" and the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for, Tuesday next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment of certain certificates;" and the bill having been amended by striking out the third section, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, it was ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Aquila Giles; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, in addition to "An act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, 1800;" and to repeal certain parts of the same; and the further consideration thereof was postponed to, and made the order of the day for,
to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill confirming Anthony Cavalier and Peter Petit in their claim to a tract of land; and, no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and it was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, praying certain amendments to the act incorporating said bank, was recommitted to the Committee on Finance.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of Francis Henderson; and, on motion by Mr.
WILSON, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in July next.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the Laws of the United States, and for other purposes," together with the amendment reported thereto by the Committee on the Judiciary; and, the amendment having been agreed to, the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to repeal part of the act, entitled "An act to provide for surveying the coasts of the United States;" and, the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and, the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An struction of the Cumberland road;" and, no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of General Moses Porter," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands; and, the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and, the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill read a third time as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Sarah Dewees, relict and widow of William Dewees, deceased, and the legal representatives of the said William Dewees;" and, no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Rodgers;" and, no amendment having been made thereto, the PRES-IDENT reported it to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the
Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An

APRIL, 1818.

THURSDAY, April 9.

SAMUEL W. DANA, from the State of Connecticut, took his seat in the Senate.

On motion by Mr. BARBOUR, it was unanimously agreed to suspend the third rule for conducting business in the Senate, as it respects the honorable Mr. DANA, to wit: "Every member when he speaks shall address the Chair, standing in his place, and when he has finished shall sit down."

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, in addition to "An act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808," and to repeal certain parts of the same; Mr. BARBOUR was requested to take the Chair, and the bill having been amended, the President resumed the Chair, and it was reported to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The bill for the relief of Samuel F. Hooker was read a third time and passed.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that they have passed the bill, which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed a resolution directing the completion of the survey of the waters of the Chesapeake Bay, and for the establishment of naval arsenals and other purposes, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The resolution last mentioned was read twice by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia;" and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the Laws of the United States, and for other purposes;" and the bill having been further amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was read a third time as amended.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," reported the same with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill for the relief of John Hall, late major of marines; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time—yeas 18, nays 12, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Campbell, Daggett, Fromentin, Gailard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Morrill, Otis, Sanford, Storer, Tait, Talbot, Van Dyke, and Williams of Tennessee.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Dickerson, Lacock, Macon, Morrow, Roberts, Ruggles, Taylor, Tichenor, Williams of Massachusetts, and Wilson.

On motion by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the petition of John Haslett, and also the petition of Hyacinth Laclotte, were discharged from the further consideration thereof respectively.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the houses of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher and Company, Thomas Clifford and Son, and Thomas Clifford, of Philadelphia, and Charles Wirgman, of Baltimore;" and also the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Gad Worthington," reported them severally without amendment.

BANK OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the same committee, to whom was recommended the memorial of the President and Directors of the Bank of the United States, reported a bill supplementary to the act entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," and the bill was read twice by unanimous consent, and considered as in Committee of the Whole; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House; and the bill was amended. Mr. C. also laid on the table the following document:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 7, 1818.

SIR: I have been informed by the president of the Bank of the United States that the board of directors have applied to the Congress of the United States for permission to issue bills and notes signed by other persons than the president and cashier of that bank. The intimate connexion which necessarily exists between that institution and the department of the Executive Government confided to my direction may render it excusable on my part to present to the Committee on Finance, under whose consideration the subject has been placed by the Senate, some of the reasons which appear to be necessarily connected with the application. It is not my intention to urge the sanction of the committee to the particular modification sought by the bank. I shall attempt only to satisfy the committee that, under the existing provisions of the charter, as construed by the corporation, it is impossible to put into circulation an amount of bills of suitable denominations to supply the necessary and indispensable demands of the community.

The president and cashier of the bank have to sign and countersign all the bills of the bank and of its various offices. They have, in addition to the ordinary duties of president and cashier of a bank, to perform all the duties of commissioner of loans for the State of Pennsylvania, and of agents for the payment of pensioners of every description for that State. They are necessarily charged with the general superintendence of all the offices established by the bank, from the District of Maine to the State of Louisiana, involving a most extensive correspondence, and imposing upon them an examination of the weekly returns of those offices. This examination is necessarily imposed upon those officers, who are bound to watch over the interests of the bank generally, and to supply the wants of the different offices; to transmit specie where there is a demand for it, and to withdraw it from points where, from the course of trade or other causes, it may have temporarily accumulated. The duty of transmitting the public funds wherever required within the United States demands and receives their unremitting attention. From the view here presented of the various and important duties assigned to them by the charter, many of which are so intimately connected with the Government as to constitute them highly important officers, it will be readily perceived that but a very small portion of their time can be devoted to the mechanical labor of signing bills and notes. It may, indeed, be said that the corporation, having the power of appointing such officers and servants as the interest of the institution may require, may appoint other officers, who may be charged with the superintendence of the interests of the institution generally, and of course with the correspondence, and distribution of the capital of the bank among the different offices, according to their various wants and necessities arising out of the course of trade, or any other cause. Such a course might, indeed, be pursued; but it would be an entire inversion of the established principle of action, not only in institutions of this nature, but of right reason, when applied to all associations whatsoever.

The signing of bills and notes is a mere mechanical act. The superintendence of an institution so extensive and complicated, intimately connected not only with the Government, but with all the wants and conveniences of society, especially influencing in a very high degree the commercial transactions of the nation, requires intellects of more than ordinary elevation, and information as various as the wants and conveniences of civilized society. To metamorphose the highest officers of the institution into mere machines, the operations of which are to be confined to tracing certain characters infinitely repeated, whilst subordinate officers or servants are invested with duties requiring the highest order of intellect and the most extensive degree of information, would indeed be an inversion of the established ideas of the moral fitness of things.

It is not my intention, nor is it the wish of the bank, to relieve the president and cashier from the mechanical labor of signing bills. This duty will always be performed by them, as far as a due attention to their other and more important duties will permit.

The reasons and facts which I have presented, in order to prove that it is impossible for the president and cashier to sign the bills necessary to the wants and convenience of the community, are supported by the experience of the bank. Twenty offices have been established, and applications for others remain suspended from the impossibility of furnishing them with bills for circulation. Two of those which were organized more than six months past have not yet been supplied with bills to commence operations. Several of those established in the Western country have been so scantily supplied as to render their operations extremely circumscribed. That established at Augusta, in Georgia, will probably be abandoned, on account of the impossibility of supplying it with bills to make the employment of capital profitable. It is understood that the measure is now under the consideration of the directors. It will be hardly necessary to prove that the failure to supply the different offices with a proper amount of bills of suitable denominations can be the result of nothing but the impossibility of furnishing that supply under the provisions of the charter. The failure must be ascribed to this impossibility, or to the negligence of the officers of the bank. The character and standing of the gentlemen to whom the neglect would be imputed forbid the admission of the charge. It may, indeed, be alleged that the labor of issuing bills will be daily diminished, as the supply will always be increasing. To this it may be answered, that the number of offices for some time to come will be increased, and that, as the labor of signing bills diminishes, the time necessarily devoted to the superintendence of the multiplied and varied concerns of the bank will increase; that, according to the course of trade, bills issued in one section of the Union will accumulate in another; and that, although a portion of those bills may in the ordinary course of trade find their way back, or be diffused over other portions, so as to diminish in a considerable degree such an accumulation, yet a considerable portion of them will remain where they are not wanted, whilst local deficiencies will be created in other places. If the bank is enabled to issue bills so as to meet the demands of the community for them, it will be its interest to supply the local wants thus created by new emissions, rather than to incur the expense and risk of transmitting those which have accumulated in particular districts to where they are wanted. This source of demand for new bills, together with the necessary supplies for lost or worn bills, will find ample employment for two persons who shall be devoted to the issuing of bills. If the bank is enabled by Congress to facilitate the issuing of bills, any surplus which accumulates in particular districts will be destroyed, and new ones issued to supply their place, and circulated where they are demanded. It is the practice with the Bank of England never to reissue their bills. It is not believed that any additional security is derived to the bank or to the community from this practice. It is mentioned simply to present to the mind of the committee the extensive means which that institution possesses of issuing bills. It is confidently believed that neither the governor nor deputy governor of that bank ever signs a bill.

I understand that the proposition of the bank is to authorize the presidents and cashiers of the various offices to issue bills for their offices respectively. This proposition appears to me to be injudicious. The multiplication of signatures upon bills, beyond the necessity of the case, is an evil which ought not to be permitted. It is, however, urged in favor of it that the bills of the offices are intended for local circulation, and that the signatures of the president and cashier of an office will be more likely to be known by their own districts than those of the president and cashier of the bank itself. This argument is specious rather than solid. Not one man in a hundred who receives bills or notes of the bank can have any other knowledge of the handwriting of the persons whose names are signed upon the bills than that which he derives from the frequent examination and comparison of the signatures upon the bills which he receives. It is, moreover, manifest from what has already been stated, and it is established by universal experience, that bills issued at the offices will circulate in the most distant parts of the nation from the place of their issue. As the organization of the bank becomes more perfect, and the principles upon which it acts become more extensively known; as it will by experience be enabled to correct the eccentricities of its officers, and discard any errors which its own directors may, from inadvertence, or from some real or supposed pressure, have committed, the circulation of its bills will become general, and the idea of locality be entirely laid aside. It would, therefore, in my humble opinion, be unwise to permit the presidents and cashiers of the offices to issue bills under their own signatures alone. Two officers, whose time should be exclusively devoted to signing of bills and notes, with the occasional aid which they would receive from the president and cashier of the bank in signing bills of large denominations, would give to the bank all the facilities which a due regard to the interests of the community can require.

In closing this communication, it may be proper to state that, independent of the convenience of the community and the interest of the bank, the Government itself has a direct interest in conferring upon the bank the authority of issuing notes and bills with more facility than it at present enjoys. According to existing laws, specie and the bills and notes of the Bank of the United States are alone receivable in all payments to the Government. It requires no argument to prove that the contributions of various kinds required by the Government from the citizens cannot at this time be paid in specie. It is not in the power of Congress to give to its citizens this ability. An act of Congress will not bring from foreign regions the gold and silver coin necessary to effect this object. But it can cause to be put in circulation a sufficiency of what it has made a legal tender, to enable the citizens who may owe the Government to discharge their debts. That the necessary supply of this currency has not been furnished is notoriously manifest; that the failure to furnish this supply has been the result of the incapacity of the bank to sign bills according to the provisions of the charter, has, I trust, been satisfactorily established.

The bill now upon your table for the relief of the purchasers of the public land is in a considerable degree the result of that incapacity. It is certainly true that if the banks had not been im providently multiplied in certain sections of the Union, the Bank of the United States and its offices would have consented to receive as specie from the officers of the Government the bills or notes of the local banks, which would have in some degree prevented the pressure which is now operating so oppressively in the northwestern section of the country.

This paper, however, it must be recollected, is no legal tender. It could become so only indirectly, through the agency of the Bank of the United States. However stable the banks in that section might have been under a different state of things than that which unfortunately exists, the people would have been equally unable as at present to discharge their duties to the Government according to law; and this inability would necessarily be ascribable to the incapacity of the bank to sign the amount of bills necessary to enable the community to discharge its debts to the Government. The Congress is now apprized of the emergency. Specie and the bills of the Bank of the United States alone are receivable at the Treasury. Specie cannot be obtained for that purpose. Bills of the Bank of the United States cannot be put into circulation to a sufficient amount for that object, because the officers of the bank are not able to sign them. The power ought to be given, the bills of other banks ought to be receivable, or further time ought to be allowed the public debtor to make his payments. Sound policy, probably, would require the application of the first and the last of these remedies. The power of issuing bills with more facility would not afford relief so promptly as to supersede the necessity of suspending temporarily the time of payment. The suspension of payment, unaccompanied by other relief, would probably find the public debtors at the expiration of the suspension but little improved in their capacity to discharge their debts.

In addition to the foregoing considerations it may be proper to state that lands to a great amount will be sold in the course of the Summer, Autumn, and Winter of the present year, in the Michigan and Missouri Territories. The bills of the Western banks, which circulate almost exclusively in those Territories, have not that credit and currency in many instances which would justify their receipt at the Treasury if the law permitted it. There is therefore great danger that much loss will be sustained in the sale of those lands for the want of a sound circulating medium in that section of the Union. The losses which the Treasury has already incurred by the receipt of bills and notes of banks which have already failed, or whose credit is doubtful, strongly indicate the necessity of avoiding further loss from that source, even at the risk of incurring a greater in the depreciated price which may consequently be received for the public lands. It has already been ascertained that, of the special deposits received during the years 1815 and 1816, more than $250,000 are of a description which justifies the most serious apprehension of the eventual loss of the greatest portion of that amount. It is my duty to suggest the propriety of giving more efficient remedies against corporate bodies for the recovery of debts. The power of summoning the debtors of the corporation as garnishers, as in cases of attachment against absent debtors, is respectfully submitted to the consideration of the committee.

I remain, with sentiments of the highest respect, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WM. H. CAMPBELL.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson," reported the same without amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings and for furnishing the Capitol and President's House," reported the same with amendments.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the same committee, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to provide for erecting additional buildings for the accommodation of the several Executive departments;" also reported the same with an amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;" and the further consideration thereof was postponed until to-morrow.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to suspend for a limited time the sale or forfeiture of lands for failure in completing the payment thereon; and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly, and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian Institute, for the promotion of arts and sciences;" a bill, entitled "An act to increase the pay of the militia while in actual service, and for other purposes;" a bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment, in certain cases, on account of Treasury notes which have been lost or destroyed;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Benjamin Berry;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Sullivan;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonathan Amory, jr., and of the representatives of Thomas C. Amory, deceased;" and also a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the widow and children of Jacob Graeff, deceased;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The seven bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian Institute, for the promotion of arts and sciences," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

The bill, entitled "An act to increase the pay of the militia while in actual service, and for other purposes," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on the Militia.

The bill, entitled "An act to authorize the payment, in certain cases, on account of Treasury notes which have been lost or destroyed," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Benjamin Berry;" the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Sullivan;" the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonathan Amory, jr., and of the representatives of Thomas C. Amory, deceased;" and also the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the widow and children of John Graeff, deceased," were severally read the second time by unanimous consent, and severally referred to the Committee of Claims.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the Laws of the United States, and for other purposes," having been reported by the committee, correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time, as amended, and passed.

The bill, in addition to "An act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808," and to repeal certain parts of the same, was read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of John Hall, late major of marines, was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act authorizing John Taylor to be placed on the list of navy pensioners;" and on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in July next.

STATISTICS OF THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the committee to whom was referred the resolution authorizing a subscription for five hundred copies of Statistical Annals, proposed to be published by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of a certain number of copies of a Statistical View of the Commerce of the United States, by Timothy Pitkin, made a report, accompanied by a bill authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Statistics; and the report and bill were read, and the bill passed to the second reading.

The report is as follows:

That the manuscript of Dr. Seybert's work has been submitted to their inspection, and, in their opinion, it combines a mass of various and valuable facts and materials, collected with thorough diligence from authentic documents, lucidly and conveniently arranged and methodized. Its main object appears to be to furnish complete information as to the past and present state of the population, navigation, commerce, manufactures, army, navy, public lands, and finances of the United States, and a series of important facts in relation to these and other connected subjects, is condensed into tabular forms and statements, exhibiting in one view an entire and comparative history of each subject. To this work much time, industry, and ability must have been devoted; and it forms a vast depository of information, the whole of which is useful and interesting, and some of which, from the conflagration of the public offices and other untoward events, is now, perhaps, nowhere else preserved. It must be apparent, then, that this work must be deemed necessary and acceptable to every functionary of the Government of the United States, either in its administrative or legislative departments. It was principally for their use the work was designed. It will expedite and facilitate the performance of their respective duties, and it is therefore natural and proper that it should receive their protection and encouragement. It appears to the committee altogether hopeless that the publication of these Statistical Annals can otherwise be obtained. It will not be undertaken by the author at his own risk. From the variety of numerical tables the expense of printing would considerably exceed that of ordinary books; and as profit cannot be expected from the sale of a work which, from its nature, can never be in a certain sense popular, there is no inducement to stimulate the enterprise of a bookseller. Works of a similar description in other countries have frequently been published at the national charge; and surely there is something in the nature of our liberal institutions that ought to induce us, as freely as any other nation, to give publicity to all we have done, as fully to develop the principles of our policy, and to ascertain as clearly the causes of our prosperity. And it may be added that the best mode of deriving benefit from experience, of rendering what is valuable in our system of political economy permanent, and of reforming what is injudicious and erroneous, can best be suggested by a systematic collation of the facts and principles on which that system is established.

The most of the foregoing remarks are likewise strictly applicable to Mr. Pitkin's published work, entitled "Commercial Statistics of the United States." It is a work of undoubted merit and utility; its facts are drawn from authentic official documents, and its numerical tables and calculations exhibit great industry and accuracy of research. It is understood that, intrinsically valuable as this work is, it has produced little or no profit to the publisher or the author; and it appears to the committee it would be unjust and ungrateful to distinguish one of these works by the praise and patronage of Congress, and leave the other unnoticed and unrewarded. The committee are therefore of opinion that a subscription for both these works ought to be authorized, and report a bill for that purpose.

SATURDAY, April 11.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major Loring Austin and George R. Wells;" the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonathan Amory, junior, and of the representatives of Thomas C. Amory, deceased;" the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Benjamin Berry;" the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the widow and children of Jacob Graeff, deceased;" and also the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Sullivan," reported the same severally without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of George Pearson;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

The bill authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals, by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics, was read the second time.

The bill to suspend for a limited time the sale or forfeiture of lands, for failure in completing the payment thereon, was read a third time, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the 'Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein described,' together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Foreign Relations; and the amendments having been agreed to, the bill was reported to the House amended accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill was read a third time as amended.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House insist on their amendment to the bill, entitled "An act to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia." They ask a conference upon the subject of the disagreeing votes of the two Houses, and have appointed managers on their part. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonas Harrison;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Dillon;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of a company of rangers;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Captain Henry Gist and Captain Benjamin Johnson;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of volunteer mounted cavalry;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry King;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States;" and, after debate, adjourned to Monday morning.

MONDAY, April 13.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Work," reported the same without amendment.

On motion by Mr. TAIT, the Committee on Naval Affairs, to whom was referred the memorial of Jairus Loomis and James Basset, sailing masters in the Navy of the United States; also the resolution instructing them to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for enforcing the attendance of witnesses before naval courts martial; and also the bill to authorize the establishment of naval depots and dock-yards; together with the Message of the President of the United States of the 23d of March, 1848, upon that subject, were discharged from the further consideration thereof respectively.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry King," was read the first and second times by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Captain Henry Gist and Captain Benjamin Johnson," was read twice by unanimous consent, and referred to the same committee.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of volunteer mounted cavalry," was read twice by unanimous consent, and, on motion by Mr. LACOCK, referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of a company of rangers," was read twice by unanimous consent, and referred to the same committee.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Dillon," was read twice by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonas Harrison," was read twice by unanimous consent, and referred to the same committee.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act in addition to the Act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein described," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the legal representatives of George Pearson," was read a third time, and passed.

On motion, it was

Resolved, That the Senate insist on their disagreement to the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to make valid certain acts of the justices of the peace in the District of Columbia," and agree to the conference proposed thereon.

Mr. DAGGETT, Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, and Mr. BURRILL were appointed the managers on the part of the Senate.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the bill supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, [authorizing the appointment of a Vice President and Deputy Cashier, for the greater facility of signing the bills:] and the bill having been amended, on the question, "shall this bill be engrossed and read a third time?" it was determined in the affirmative—yeas 17, nays 14, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Campbell, Crittenden, Daggett, Dana, Dickerson, Eppes, Hunter, King, Leake, Morrow, Otis, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Tichenor.

NAYS—Messrs. Fromentin, Gaillard, Horsey, Lacock, Macon, Noble, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Talbot, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom the subject was referred, reported a bill fixing the compensation of Indian agents and factors; and the bill was read twice by unanimous consent.

Mr. BARBOUR, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, to whom was referred the Message from the President of the United States of the 10th March, 1818, respecting a commercial agreement with the Netherlands, reported a bill concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases; and the bill was read twice by unanimous consent.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill to promote the progress of useful arts, and to repeal the acts heretofore made for that purpose, together with the amendments reported thereto by the select committee; and, on motion by Mr. DAGGETT, the further consideration thereof was postponed until the first Monday in July next.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the memorial of John Brooks, of the State of Ohio, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted. The report and resolution were read, and agreed to.

On motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL, the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, prepared in obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 11th of December, 1817, relative to the prompt settlement of public accounts, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the managers on the part of the Senate, at the conference on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," made the following report :

That the committee of conference on the part of the Senate met the committee on the part of the House of Representatives on the disagreement relative to the said amendment, and agreed to recommend to the two Houses—

1. That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the said amendment.

2. That the said bill be further amended, by striking out of the second section thereof, in the first line, the word "first day of April next," and inserting instead "eighteenth instant."

ILLINOIS TERRITORY.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union, on an equal footing with the original States," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on Public Lands.

A motion was made, by Mr. TAIT, to postpone the further consideration thereof until the fourth day of July next.

This motion was debated, and was supported by Mr. TAIT, not from any disposition to oppose the admission of this State into the Union, but on the ground that there was not sufficiently authentic information that its population was forty thousand, as stated from conjecture, or even that its population was sufficient to entitle it to a representative in Congress.

To this argument, Messrs. MORROW, TALBOT, and BARBOUR, replied, and opposed the postponement, believing the evidence on this head to be so strong as to admit of no doubt.

The question on the proposed postponement was decided in the negative—yeas 4, nays 29, as follows :

YEAS—Messrs. Daggett, King, Sanford, and Tait.
NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Campbell, Crittenden, Dana, Dickerson, Eppes, Fromentin, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, Lacock, Leake, Macon, Morrill, Morrow, Noble, Otis, Ruggles Smith, Stokes, Storer, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

The amendments having been agreed to, and the bill further amended, the bill was reported to the House accordingly ; and the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed, and the bill be read a third time as amended.

TUESDAY, April 14.

On motion, by Mr. SANFORD, the Committee on Pensions were directed to inquire into the propriety of granting a pension to George Bell.

Mr. HORSEY submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury procure, and lay before the Senate of the United States, immediately after the commencement of the next session of Congress, a statement showing what sum was actually paid by the subscribers, on account of the capital stock of the Bank of the United States, at the several times of payment prescribed by the charter, in gold and silver coin, and what sum in the funded debt of the United States. Also, showing the amount of capital stock of the said bank, as the same may then be, specifying what proportion thereof is of gold and silver coin, and what proportion is of the funded debt. Also, showing the amount of the debts due to the said bank, specifying the amount due at Philadelphia, and the amount due at the offices of discount and deposit, respectively. Also, showing the amount of the money deposited, specifying the amount thereof deposited at Philadelphia, and the amount deposited at the offices of discount and deposit, respectively, and discriminating between the amount of the deposits made by individuals, and the amount made on account of the public. Also, showing the notes in circulation, specifying the amount payable at the bank in Philadelphia, and the amount payable at the offices of discount and deposit, respectively.

Mr. BARBOUR presented the petition of John B. Timberlake, praying provision for an equitable adjustment of his accounts, as purser, with the Navy Department ; and the petition was read, and referred to the Committee on Naval Affairs.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act respecting the organization of the Army, and for other purposes," reported the same with amendments ; which were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the committee of conference on the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes," recommending to the two Houses—

1st. That the Senate recede from their disagreement to the said amendment.

2d. That the said bill be further amended, by striking out of the second section thereof, line one, the words, "first day of April next," and inserting instead, "eighteenth instant."

Whereupon, Resolved, That they disagree to the first recommendation of the committee of conference ; that they agree to the second recommendation of the said committee ; and that the bill be amended accordingly.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act fixing the time for the next meeting of Congress ;" and the bill having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly ; and the amendment being concurred in, was ordered to be engrossed and the bill read a third time as amended.

Mr. EPPES presented the memorial of Daniel Brent and others, clerks employed in the Executive offices of the Government, praying the attention of Congress to the importance of their duties, and the inadequacy of their compensation ; and the memorial was read.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to continue in force an act, entitled 'An act relating to settlers on lands of the United States,'" reported the same without amendment.

Mr. MORRIL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Samuel Smith, attorney for Elisha Allen, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the prayer of the petitioner ought not to be granted. The report and resolution were read.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act to enable the people of the Illinois Territory to form a constitution and State government, and for the admission of such State into the Union on an equal footing with the original States," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended and passed.

The bill, supplementary to the act, entitled "An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States," was read a third time, and passed—yeas 18, nays 15, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Campbell, Crittenden, Daggett, Dana, Dickerson, Eppes, Hunter, King, Lenke, Morrow, Otis, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Taylor, and Tichenor.

NAYS—Messrs. Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Lacock, Morrill, Noble, Ruggles, Sanford, Smith, Talbot, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, Williams of Tennessee, and Wilson.

So it was Resolved, That this bill pass, and that the title thereof be "An act in addition to 'An act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States.'"

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill concerning tonnage and discriminating duties in certain cases; and the bill having been amended, it was reported to the House; and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill authorizing a subscription for the Statistical Annals, by Adam Seybert, and the purchase of Pitkin's Commercial Statistics; and the bill having been amended, it was reported to the House; and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill fixing the compensation of Indian agents and factors; and the bill having been amended, it was reported to the House accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, the bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major General Brown," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Claims; and the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed and the bill be read a third time as amended.

Mr. CAMPBELL, from the Committee on Finance, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Dillon;" also, the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonas Harrison;" reported the same without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Gad Worthington," and no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the House, and passed to the second reading.

Mr. STORER, from the Committee on the Militia, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to increase the pay of the militia while in actual service, and for other purposes," reported the same without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to establish a port of entry and delivery at Cape Vincent, at the fork of Lake Ontario and the head of the river St. Lawrence," and no amendment having been made thereto, it was reported to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act to abolish the port of delivery established at the mouth of Slade's Creek, in the State of North Carolina;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Seth Sprague and others;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House, and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Thomas Miller and Stephen Baker," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee of Claims; and the amendments having been agreed to, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House amended accordingly; and the amendments being concurred in, they were ordered to be engrossed and the bill was read a third time as amended.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John Anderson; and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House, and, on the question, "Shall this bill be read a third time?" it was determined in the negative; so it was rejected.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House recede from their amendment, to which the Senate have disagreed to the bill, entitled "An act directing the manner of appointing Indian agents, and continuing the 'Act for establishing trading-houses with the Indian tribes,'" and that they agree to the amendment proposed to the said bill in the second recommendation. They concur in the amendments of the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes," except the seventh and eighth, to which they disagree. They have passed the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Briggs," with an amendment, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have also passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John B. Dabney;" a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of James Mackay of the Missouri Territory;" and a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonathan D. Essary and John Seybold;" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The three bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John B. Dabney," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jas. Mackay, of the Missouri Territory," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

The bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonathan D. Essary and John Seybold," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the same committee.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendment of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Isaac Briggs," and non-concurred therein.

The Senate proceeded to consider their amendments, disagreed to by the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to provide for the publication of the laws of the United States, and for other purposes."

Whereupon, Resolved, That they recede from their seventh amendment to the said bill, and insist on their eighth amendment, disagreed to by the House of Representatives.

On motion, by Mr. CAMPBELL, the committee on the memorial of the State of Tennessee, respecting claims to lands in that State, who were instructed to inquire into the propriety of making a reservation of land for the establishment of a military depot, armory, and foundry, on the waters of Shoal creek, in the State of Tennessee, were discharged from the further consideration thereof.

WEDNESDAY, April 15.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Military Affairs, to whom were referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of volunteer mounted cavalry;" and also the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of a company of rangers," reported the same, severally, without amendment.

Mr. MORRILL, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Captain Henry Gist, and Captain Benjamin Johnson;" and also the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Henry King," reported the same, severally, without amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH submitted the following motion for consideration :

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before the Senate, at an early period of their next session, a list of the useless officers of the customs, with the names of their offices, salaries, emoluments, and the places where held; specifying such as it may be proper to suppress and discharge in consequence of their unproductiveness, the inconsiderable services rendered, or of any other cause.

Mr. MORROW, from the Committee on Public Lands, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of certain friendly Creek Indians, of the mixed blood," reported the same with amendments; which were read.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion submitted on the 14th instant, and the same having been modified, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury procure, and lay before the Senate of the United States, immediately after the commencement of the next session of Congress, a statement showing what sum was actually paid by the subscribers, on account of the capital stock of the Bank of the United States, at the several times of payment prescribed by the charter, in gold and silver coin, and what sum in the funded debt of the United States. Also, showing the amount of the capital stock of the said bank, as the same may then be, specifying what proportion thereof is of gold and silver coin, and what proportion is of the funded debt. Also, showing the amount of the debts due to the said bank, specifying the amount due at Philadelphia, and the amount due at the offices of discount and deposit, respectively. Also, showing the amount of the money deposited, specifying the amount thereof deposited at Philadelphia, and the amount deposited at the offices of discount and deposit, respectively, and discriminating between the amount of the deposits made by individuals, and the amount made on account of the public. Also, showing the notes issued and the notes in circulation, specifying the amount payable at the bank in Philadelphia, and the amount payable at the offices of discount and deposit, respectively.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed a bill, entitled "An act to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles imported into the United States;" a bill, entitled "An act making the port of Bath, in Massachusetts, a port of entry for ships or vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope, and from places beyond the same, and for establishing a collection district, whereof Belfast shall be the port of entry;" a bill, entitled "An act to increase the compensation of deputy postmasters in certain cases;" a bill, entitled "An act providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouses;" a bill, entitled "An act to increase the duties on iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum;" and, also, a bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the second day of March, 1791,'" in which bills they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The six bills last mentioned were read, and severally passed to the second reading.

The bill, entitled "An act to increase the duties on iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum;" the bill, entitled "An act to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles imported into the United States;" the bill, entitled "An act making the port of Bath, in Massachusetts, a port of entry for ships or vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope, and from places beyond the same, and for establishing a collection district, whereof Belfast shall be the port of entry; and also, the bill, entitled "An act providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouses," were severally read the second time by unanimous consent, and severally referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

The bill, entitled "An act supplementary to an act, entitled 'An act to regulate the collection of duties on imports and tonnage, passed the second day of March 1791,'" was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

The bill, entitled "An act to increase the compensation of deputy postmasters in certain cases," was read the second time by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Post Offices and Post Roads.

FUNDED DEBT.

The PRESIDENT communicated a report of the Secretary of the Treasury, made in obedience to a resolution of the Senate, of the 4th instant, requiring him to report to the Senate the amount of the funded debt of the United States, bearing an interest of seven, six, and three per cent., which has been paid by the subscribers towards the capital of the Bank of the United States; distinguishing the amount of each which has been paid upon the several instalments; stating the sums and species of funded debt sold by the Bank; how much thereof was redeemed by the United States; how much has been sold without the United States; and how much is now held by the bank; and the report was read, as follows:

TREASURY DEPARTMENT, April 15, 1818.

SIR: In obedience to a resolution of the Senate of the 4th of April, instant, requiring the Secretary of the Treasury to report to the Senate the amount of the funded debt of the United States, bearing an interest of seven, six, and three per cent., which has been paid by the subscribers towards the capital of the Bank of the United States, distinguishing the amount of each which has been paid upon the several instalments; stating the sums and species of funded debt sold by the bank; how much thereof was redeemed by the United States; how much has been sold without the United States; and how much is now held by the bank; I have the honor to submit the statements A and B, and such parts of the correspondence between this Department and the president of the bank [Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4] as relate to this subject; which, together, furnish all the information required by the resolution, which it is in the power of the Department to furnish.

It may be proper, however, to observe, that the bank had sent to Europe two millions of the funded debt, which had been paid by the subscribers, which was intended to be sold or pledged for the purpose of raising specie. When the redemption of the stock held by the bank was about to be effected, it was not known whether the whole or any part of the stock in Europe had been sold. The Board of Directors concluded that stock sold by the bank without the United States, in conformity with the charter, could not be redeemed at the will of the Government; and that, as as it was probable that the stock then in Europe had been sold or pledged, it could not be redeemed. This construction was rejected by the Treasury; but an offer was made to receive from the bank an equal amount of the same kind of stock, provided the bank would, as the agent of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, purchase it at its own expense, and deliver it at par to the Government. This proposition was accepted by the bank, and has been carried into effect.

The only sum remaining in the hands of the bank, subject to redemption at the will of the Government, is the $421,668 53, admitted to be in the hands of the bank, by the letter of the president, (marked No. 4.)

This amount will be immediately redeemed according to the provisions of the charter.

I have the honor to be, your most obedient and very humble servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The Register begs leave to report to the Secretary of the Treasury that the funded debt of the United States, on the 31st December, 1817, is stated at the following sums:

Six per cent. stocks	-	-	-	$70,011,081	74
Three per cents.	-	-	-	13,464,862	35
Seven per cents.	-	-	-	8,630,879	49
				92,106,823	58

That the following sums were extinguished of the public funded debt, by payments made by the subscribers towards the capital of the Bank of the United States:

Six per cent. stocks	-	-	-	$11,471,256	24

Funded Debt.

SENATE.

B.—A Statement of Funded Debt of the United States, received on account of the respective instalments to the capital of the Bank of the United States, and of the disposition thereof.

Instalments of Funded Debt, &c.	Six per cents.	Three per cents.	Seven per cents.	Old six per cents.	Deferred six per cents.
Received on account of the first instalment -	$6,173,878 46	$1,092,109 19	$65,221 52	$38,217 36	$23,006 54
Received on account of the second instalment -	5,127,949 64	1,136,725 14	232,925 62	335,707 06	135,649 05
Received on account of the third instalment -	442,250 34	165,107 45	35,167 46	340,622 29	42,427 81
Totals -	$11,744,078 44	$2,393,941 78	$333,314 60	$714,546 71	$201,083 40
Of the above, there has been redeemed by the United States -	$9,427,489 11	$2,253,221 45	$332,984 60	$374,196 35	$158,764 31
Sold in London -	(a) 2,000,000 00
In possession of the Bank of the United States, redeemable at the will of the Government of the United States -	316,569 33	140,720 33	330 00	340,350 36	42,319 09
Totals -	$11,744,078 44	$2,393,941 78	$333,314 60	$714,546 71	$201,083 40

(a) This sum, pledged in London for the purpose of procuring specie for the bank, and sold there, is redeemable at the period stated in the certificates of the said stock; but as the Secretary of the Treasury, in behalf of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, claimed the right of redemption at the will of the Government, the bank, in conformity to the compromise proposed by the Secretary of the Treasury, in behalf of the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, did purchase, as the agent of the said Commissioners, an equal amount of similar stock, and delivered the same at the par value thereof, the bank paying the difference between the par value and the actual cost of the said stock, conditioned that the terms of redemption of the two millions sold in London should be according to the periods stated in the certificates thereof; which agreement has been duly confirmed by the Secretary of the Treasury.

BANK OF THE U. S., April 9, 1818.

No. 1.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,

June 30, 1817.

SIR: To enable the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund to redeem the debt held by the bank, it will be necessary to transmit to this office a descriptive list, showing the amount of the different descriptions in its possession.

Upon the receipt of this list, a warrant will issue at the Treasury in favor of the bank, bearing date on the first day of July of the present year. The warrants for the amount sent to Europe, and directed to be sold, will be transmitted to the bank as soon as it shall have completed the purchase of an equal amount.

An impression has hitherto prevailed, that the seven per cent. stock subscribed to the bank could not be redeemed under the existing law, as the rate to which the Commissioners are limited in their purchases is below that to which it was subscribed to the bank; but, upon a more deliberate examination of the provisions of the third section of the act to provide for the reduction of the public debt, doubts have arisen on the subject. The use of the words "purchase and redemption," in that section, presents rather a confused idea, as there is a manifest distinction between the terms, both in theory and practice.

The question will be more deliberately examined, and the result communicated to the bank before the warrants are issued. I have the honor to be, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

No. 2.

BANK OF THE U. S., July 3, 1817.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 30th ultimo, and now transmit the enclosed descriptive list of the funded debt held by the bank, agreeably to your request; which list includes the two millions sent by Mr. Sergeant, to wit:

In 6 per cent. stock of 1814 . . . .	$7,236 83
6 per cent. stock of 1815 . . . .	392,886 82
6 per cent. stock of eleven million loan . . . .	329,450 00
6 per cent. stock of seven and a half million loan . . . .	122,176 64
6 per cent. stock of sixteen million loan . . . .	926,068 34
6 per cent. stock of ten million loan . . . .	68,376 47
6 per cent. stock of six million loan . . . .	153,804 90

Owing to the irregularity of some of the Commissioners, the negligence of others, and the want of information from some of the loan offices, as to the Commissioners by whom the stock was transmitted in order to be transferred to the bank, the amount of the funded debt is yet imperfect, and not sufficiently defined to enable the bank to give an accurate detailed list. In many cases surplus sums have been delivered to the Commissioners, owing to the distance between the places of subscription and the loan offices; and, in many of these cases, the Commissioners have erroneously transferred the whole amount to the bank instead of the specific sum subscribed, and of course the bank will have to retransfer these surpluses to the subscribers. In other cases deficiencies appear, and, until these errors can be corrected, the statement will exhibit but an approximation, which, however, cannot be far from the truth.

Some funded debt will no doubt be paid on account of the third instalment, and as soon as it may be practicable to furnish a complete and correct statement of the whole of the funded debt received on account of the capital stock of the bank, it shall be transmitted to the Department. The paper herewith enclosed, and the explanations which I have the honor now to submit, will exhibit all the information on the subject which it is at this time in the power of the bank to afford.

I have the honor to be, with great respect, sir, your obedient servant,

Hon. W. H. CRAWFORD.

No. 3.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
April 6, 1818.

SIR: By referring to your statement of the Bank of the United States of the 23d ultimo, it appears that there is in possession of the bank funded debt of the United States, of various descriptions, four hundred and twenty-one thousand six hundred and sixty-eight dollars and fifty-eight cents. As the same statement presents an item of funded debt pledged as security for bills and notes discounted, it is presumed that the former must be stock paid to the bank by the subscribers. The amount held in Europe is also stated to be $2,954,264 26. I will thank you to inform me, as early as possible, whether the first item, and the difference between the last-mentioned sum and $2,000,000, is not stock held by the bank, subject to the right of redemption secured to the United States under the charter.

I will also thank you to give me such information, in conformity with the enclosed resolution of the Senate, as you can readily furnish. I am, &c.

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

WM. JONES, Esq., Pres't Bank U. S.

No. 4.

BANK OF THE U. S., April 9, 1818.

SIR: I have had the honor to receive your letter of the 6th instant, and hasten to submit the information therein required.

The statement herewith enclosed contains all the information required by the resolution of the Senate of the 4th instant, and also exhibits the actual amount of the balance of funded debt subscribed by individuals, companies, and corporations, to the capital of the bank, and now remaining in its possession, redeemable at the will of the Government.

The statement of the 23d ultimo, to which you refer, exhibits the sum of $421,668 58,* which is the actual value of the balance abovementioned, reduced according to the rates at which the several species of stock were subscribed.

The item in the above statement designated "bills discounted on personal security and pledged funded debt," is stock belonging to and standing in the name of the borrowers, and held by the bank as collateral security for the payment of their respective obligations.

The amount stated to be pledged in Europe is the two millions of six per cent. stock originally pledged and ordered to be sold in London; the sale had not been finally closed at the last dates received, but was progressing as fast as the partial demand for our stocks would admit. The last price quoted is 104½, including dividend. This item in the statements of the bank rendered to the Treasury remains unaltered, waiting for the final account of sales, and the orders to transfer the balance of the stock to the European purchasers.

The $54,267 26 included in that item is not in fact funded debt, but the premium paid by the bank on the two millions purchased under the compromise with the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund, and charged in that item until the final account of the sale of the two millions in London shall be received, from which it is hoped the bank may be reimbursed.

I have the honor to be, with the highest respect, sir, your obedient servant,

W. JONES, Pres't.

Hon. WM. H. CRAWFORD,
Secretary of the Treasury.

THURSDAY, April 16.

Mr. WILSON, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant Samuel Brown, made a report, accompanied by a resolution, that the petitioner have leave to withdraw his papers. The report and resolution were read.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to increase the duties on iron in bars and bolts, iron in pigs, castings, nails, and alum," reported the same without amendment.

He also reported the bill, entitled "An act making the port of Bath, in Massachusetts, a port of entry for ships or vessels arriving from the Cape of Good Hope, and from places beyond the same, and for establishing a collection district, whereof Belfast shall be the port of entry," without amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 15th instant, in relation to offices of the customs; and the same having been modified, was agreed to as follows:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to direct the proper officer to lay before the Senate, at an early period of their next session, a list of such offices of the customs, with the name of their officers, salaries, emoluments, and the places where held, as it may be proper to suppress and discharge, in consequence of their unproductiveness, the inconsiderable services rendered, or of any other cause.

Mr. TAIT submitted the following motion for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States

* The actual value of the stock described in the last item of the enclosed statement, at the rate at which it was subscribed, is $436,156 54; the difference between this sum and that in the statement of the 23d ultimo, $14,487 96, is not regularly accounted for by the Commissioners, but the whole is included in the statement now rendered.

be requested to cause to be laid before the Senate, as early as possible in the next session, a full statement respecting the navy pension fund; specifying particularly the captures from which the said fund has been formed; how much from each; and at what times received; in what stocks the moneys belonging to said fund have been vested; at what times, and by whom as agent; what has been the annual income from the stocks belonging to said fund, and what has been done with the surpluses, if any, after paying off the navy pensioners.

The bill entitled "An act to provide for erecting additional buildings for the accommodation of the several Executive departments," was read a third time, and passed.

The amendments to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the houses of Thomas and John Clifford, Elisha Fisher and Company, Thomas Clifford and Son, and Thomas Clifford of Philadelphia, and Charles Wirgman of Baltimore," having been reported by the committee correctly engrossed, the bill was read a third time as amended, and passed.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the resolution directing the completion of the survey of the waters of the Chesapeake Bay, and for the establishment of naval arsenals, and other purposes; and the resolution having been amended, the PRESIDENT reported it to the House accordingly; and the amendment being concurred in, it was ordered to be engrossed and the resolution be read a third time as amended.

Mr. ROBERTS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of John B. Dabney," reported the same without amendment.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Major Loring Austin and George R. Wells," and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House; and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Benjamin Berry;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House; and it was passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Jonathan Amory, jr., and of the representatives of Thomas C. Amory, deceased;" and no amendment having been made thereto, the PRESIDENT reported the bill to the House; and it passed to a third reading.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings and for furnishing the Capitol and President's House," together with the amendments reported thereto by the Committee on the District of Columbia; and the amendments having been agreed to with a further amendment—

On motion by Mr. LACOCK, to strike out from the end of the sixth line of the first section, to the end of the ninth line, as follows:

"For procuring materials, laying the foundation, and other preparations for the centre building of the Capitol, one hundred thousand dollars."

It was determined in the negative—yeas 6, nays 24, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Eppes, Lacock, Morrow, Stokes, Taylor, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Burrill, Crittenden, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Leake, Macon, Morrill, Otis, Roberts, Sanford, Smith, Tait, Talbot, Tichenor, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

The bill was then reported to the House amended as follows:

Strike out the 19th, 20th, and 21st lines of the first section.

Sec. 1, line 26, strike out "thirty," and insert "twenty."

Same section, line 27, after "dollars," insert, "for making good a deficiency in the appropriation of the past year for furnishing the President's House, ten thousand dollars."

Sec. 2, line 5, strike out "presiding officer thereof," and insert, "Vice President of the United States."

The amendments having been concurred in, Mr. MACON moved to strike out "for furnishing the President's House, twenty thousand dollars."

This motion was advocated by Mr. MACON and Mr. EPPES, at some length, and briefly by Mr. WILSON; and opposed by Mr. KING and Mr. BARBOUR; after which the question was taken on the motion and decided in the negative—yeas 11, nays 22, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Burrill, Crittenden, Dickerson, Eppes, Macon, Morrow, Ruggles, Talbot, Taylor, Tichenor, and Wilson.

NAYS—Messrs. Barbour, Daggett, Fromentin, Gaillard, Goldsborough, Horsey, Hunter, Johnson, King, Lacock, Leake, Morrill, Otis, Roberts, Sanford, Smith, Stokes, Storer, Tait, Van Dyke, Williams of Mississippi, and Williams of Tennessee.

The amendments were then ordered to be engrossed and the bill was read a third time as amended.

FRIDAY, April 17.

A message from the House of Representatives informed the Senate that the House have passed the bill which originated in the Senate, entitled "An act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808, and to repeal certain parts of the same," with amendments, in which they request the concurrence of the Senate. They have passed a bill, entitled "An act to continue in force, from and after the thirtieth of June, 1819, until the thirtieth of June, 1826, the fourth paragraph of the first section of the act, entitled 'An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage, and for other purposes;' in which bill they request the concurrence of the Senate.

The Senate resumed, as in Committee of the Whole, the consideration of the bill, entitled "An act making appropriations for the public buildings

The bill last mentioned was read twice by unanimous consent, and referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. SANFORD, from said committee, reported the said bill without amendment.

The Senate proceeded to consider the amendments of the House of Representatives to the bill, entitled "An act to prohibit the introduction of slaves into any port or place within the jurisdiction of the United States, from and after the first day of January, in the year of our Lord 1808, and to repeal certain parts of the same." Whereupon,

Resolved, That they concur therein.

Mr. VAN DYKE presented the petition of Thos. Fletcher, Sidney Gardiner, John Stoddart, and Rufus Tyler, of the city of Philadelphia, proprietors of a new and useful improvement for making screws of wire, commonly called "wood screws," praying a specific duty may be laid on the importation of such articles; and the petition was read.

Mr. SANFORD, from the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to increase the duties on certain manufactured articles imported into the United States;" and also the bill, entitled "An act providing for the deposit of wines and distilled spirits in public warehouses," reported them severally, without amendment.

Mr. GOLDSBOROUGH, from the Committee on the District of Columbia, to whom was referred the bill, entitled "An act to incorporate the Columbian Institute for the promotion of arts and sciences," reported the same without amendment.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the motion of the 16th instant, requesting a full statement respecting the navy pension fund, to be laid before the Senate as early as possible in the next session; and agreed thereto.

The Senate resumed the consideration of the report of the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of Lieutenant Samuel Brown; and in concurrence therewith, the petitioner had leave to withdraw his papers.

The bill entitled "An act for the relief of Mary Sullivan," was read a third time, and passed.

ELECTION OF SPEAKER, &c.

A quorum, consisting of a majority of the whole number of members, being present, the House then proceeded to the choice of a SPEAKER. On counting the votes, it appeared that of 147 votes given in, there were for HENRY CLAY, 143; for SAMUEL SMITH, 6; blank, 1.

So that Mr. CLAY was declared to be duly elected Speaker; and, being conducted to the Chair, the usual oath was administered to him, by Mr. BASSETT; when the SPEAKER made his acknowledgments to the House in the following terms:

"If we consider, gentlemen; the free and illustrious origin of this assembly; the extent and magnitude of the interests committed to its charge; and the brilliant prospects of the rising confederacy, whose destiny may be materially affected by the legislation of Congress, the House of Representatives justly ranks amongst the most eminent deliberative bodies that have existed. To be appointed to preside at its deliberations, is an exalted honor, of which I entertain the highest sense; and I pray you to accept, for the flattering manner in which you have conferred it, my profound acknowledgments.

"If I bring into the Chair, gentlemen, the advantage of some experience of its duties, far from inspiring me with undue confidence, that experience serves only to fill me with distrust of my own capacity. I have been taught by it, how arduous those duties are, and how unavailing would be any efforts of mine to discharge them, without the liberal support and cheering countenance of the House. I shall anxiously seek, gentlemen, to merit that support and countenance, by an undeviating aim at impartiality, and at the preservation of that decorum, without the observance of which, the public business must be illy transacted, and the dignity and the character of the House seriously impaired."

The members having been severally qualified by taking the oath to support the Constitution, the House proceeded to elect a Clerk. On counting the ballots, it appeared that 144 votes were given in, all of which were for THOMAS DOUGHERTY, who resumed his place as Clerk of the House.

THOMAS CLAXTON was then re-appointed Doorkeeper, BENJAMIN BURCH Assistant Doorkeeper, and THOMAS DUNN Sergeant-at-Arms, without opposition.

After the usual incipient proceedings, and interchanging messages with the Senate, the House adjourned to twelve o'clock to-morrow.

TUESDAY, December 2.

Several other members, to wit: from New Jersey, EPHRAIM BATEMAN; from Virginia, WILLIAM J. LEWIS; and from Tennessee, THOMAS CLAIBORNE and THOMAS HOGG, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

MR. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, from the joint committee appointed yesterday to wait on the President of the United States, reported, that the committee had performed that service, and that the PRESIDENT answered, that he would make a communication to the two Houses of Congress to-day, at 12 o'clock.

A Message, in writing, was then received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES, which was read and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union; and five thousand copies thereof ordered to be printed for the use of the members of the House. [For this Message, see Senate proceedings of this date, page 12.]

WEDNESDAY, December 3.

Several other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JOHN SERGEANT; from Virginia, PETERSON GOODWYN and THOMAS M. NELSON; and from South Carolina, WILSON NESBITT, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

THE SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from John Gardiner, Chief Clerk in the General Land Office, accompanied with two copies of a map of the bounty lands in the Illinois Territory, engraved for the use of the soldiers of the late army; which was ordered to lie on the table.

STANDING COMMITTEES.

On motion, by Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the House proceeded to the appointment of the Standing Committees, pursuant to the rules and orders of the House. They are as follows:

Committee of Ways and Means—Mr. Lowndes, Mr. Smith, of Maryland, Mr. Burwell, Mr. Pitkin, Mr. Abbott, Mr. Sergeant, and Mr. Trimble.

REFERENCE OF THE MESSAGE.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, being called to the Chair.

The President's Message was the subject of consideration.

Mr. TAYLOR moved a series of resolutions, embracing the following references of various parts of the Message :

Resolved, That so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the subject of Foreign Affairs, and to our commercial intercourse with British Colonial ports, be referred to a select committee.

"That so much as relates to military affairs; so much as relates to an improvement in the organization and discipline of the militia; so much as relates to naval affairs; so much as relates to the improvement of the Indian tribes in the arts of civilized life; so much as relates to roads, canals, and seminaries of learning; so much as relates to the illicit introduction of slaves from Amelia Island into the United States; so much as relates to the public buildings, and to the erection of new edifices for the accommodation of the Heads of Departments and the Attorney General; so much as relates to the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army, be severally referred to select committees, with leave to report by bill or otherwise.

"That so much as relates to manufactures be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures; so much as relates to the subject of revenue and the internal taxes, be referred to the Committee of Ways and Means; so much as relates to the purchase of lands from the Indian tribes, to the Committee on Public Lands.

The first resolution having been read for consideration, Mr. CLAY (the Speaker) moved to amend the same by adding to the end thereof the following words:

"And that the said committee be instructed to inquire whether any, and if any what, provisions of law are necessary to insure to the American colonies of Spain a just observance of the duties incident to the neutral relation in which the United States stand, in the existing war between them and Spain."

Mr. CLAY said, that his presenting at so early a period of the session this subject to the consideration of the House, was in consequence of certain proceedings which he had seen represented in the public prints as having taken place before certain of our courts of justice. Two or three cases bearing on this subject had come to his knowledge, which he wished to state to the House. The first had occurred at Philadelphia, before the circuit court of the United States held in that city. The circumstances of the case, for which however he did not pretend to vouch, having seen them through the channel already indicated, were these—if they were incorrectly stated, he was happy that a gentleman had taken his seat this morning from that city, who would be able to correct him: that nine or ten British disbanded officers had formed in Europe the resolution to unite themselves with the Spanish patriots in the contest existing between them and Spain; that to carry into effect this intention they had sailed from Europe, and in their transit to South America had touched at the port of Philadelphia; that, during their residence in Philadelphia, wearing, perhaps, the arms and habiliments of military men, making no disguise of their intention to participate in the struggle, they took passage in a vessel bound to some port in South America; that, a knowledge of this fact having come to the ears of the public authorities, or, perhaps at the instigation of some agent of the Spanish Government, a prosecution was commenced against these officers, who, from their inability to procure bail, were confined in prison. If, said Mr. C., the circumstances attending this transaction be correctly stated, it becomes an imperious duty in the House to institute the inquiry contemplated by the amendment which I have proposed. That this was an extraordinary case was demonstrated by the fact of the general sensation which it had excited on the subject in the place where it had occurred. Filled as that respectable and populous city is with men differing widely on political topics, and entertaining various views of political affairs, but one sentiment, Mr. C. said, prevailed on this subject, which was favorable to the persons thus arraigned. With regard to the conduct of the court on this occasion, he would say nothing. The respect which, whilst he had a seat on this floor, he should always show to every department of the Government; the respect he entertained for the honorable Judge who had presided, forbade him from pronouncing the decision of that court to have been unwarranted by law. But he felt himself perfectly sustained in saying, that if the proceeding was warranted by the existing law, it was the imperious duty of Congress to alter the law in this respect. For what, he asked, was the neutral obligation which one nation owed to another engaged in war? The essence of it is this; that the belligerent means of the neutral shall not be employed in the war in favor of either of the parties. That is the whole of the obligation of a third party in a war between two others. It certainly does not require of one nation to restrain the belligerent means of other nations. If those nations choose to permit their means to be employed in behalf of either party, it is their business to look to it, and not ours. Let the conduct of the persons prosecuted be regarded in its most unfavorable light; let it be considered as the passage of troops through our country, and there was nothing in our neutral obligations forbidding it. The passage of troops through a neutral country, according to his impressions, was a question depending on the particular interest, quiet, or repose of the country traversed, and might be granted or refused, at its discretion, without in any degree affecting the obligations of the neutral to either of the parties engaged in the controversy. But surely, Mr. C. said, this was not a case of the passage of troops, the persons apprehended not being in sufficient number; not organized or equipped in such a manner as, under any construction, to constitute a military corps.

On this case he would detain the House no longer, he said; for he was satisfied they could not but agree with him, if the law justified the proceeding that had taken place, that law ought to be immediately amended. Other cases had occurred in which it appeared to him it became the Congress to interpose its authority. Persons sailing under the flag of the provinces had been arraigned in our courts, and tried for piracy; in one case, after having been arraigned, tried, and acquitted of piracy, the same individuals, on the instigation of a Spanish officer or agent, had been again arraigned for the same offence. The gentleman from Massachusetts would correct him if he was wrong, for the case had occurred in the town of Boston. We admit the flag of these colonies into our ports, said Mr. C.; we profess to be neutral; but if our laws pronounce that the moment the property and persons under that flag enter our ports, they shall be seized, the one claimed by the Spanish Minister or Consul as the property of Spain, and the other prosecuted as pirates, that law ought to be altered if we mean to perform our neutral professions. I have brought the subject before this House thus promptly, said Mr. C., because I trust that in this House the cause will find justice; that, however treated elsewhere, on this floor will be found a guardian interest attending to our performance of the just obligations of neutrality. Hitherto, he said, whatever might have been our intentions, our acts have all been on the other side. From the proclamation of 1815, issued to terminate an expedition supposed to be organizing in Louisiana—an expedition existing only in the mind of the Chevalier de Onís—down to the late act, whether the measure was a proper one or not he did not say; his confidence in the Executive led him to suppose it was adopted on sufficient grounds—down to the order for suppressing, as it was called, the establishments at Amelia Island and Galveston—all the acts of the Government had been on one side; they all bore against the colonies, against the cause in which the patriots of South America were arduously engaged. It became us, he said, to look to the other side, honestly intending neutrality, as he believed we did. Let us recollect the condition of the patriots; no minister here to spur on our Government, as was said in an interesting and it appeared to him a very candid work recently published in this country, respecting the progress of the South American revolution; no Minister here to be rewarded by noble honors in consequence of the influence he is supposed to possess with the American Government. No; their unfortunate case, Mr. C. said, was what ours had been in the years 1778 and 1779—their Ministers, like our Franklins and Jays at that day, were skulking about Europe imploring inexorable legitimacy one kind look—some aid to terminate a war afflicting to humanity. Nay, their situation was worse than ours; for we had one great and magnanimous ally to recognise us, but no nation had stepped forward to acknowledge any of these provinces. Such disparity between the parties; Mr. C. said, demanded a just attention to the interests of the party which was unrepresented; and if the facts which he had mentioned, and others which had come to his knowledge, were correct, they loudly demanded the interposition of Congress. He trusted the House would give the subject their attention, and show that here, in this place, the obligations of neutrality would be strictly regarded in respect to Spanish America.

Mr. SERGEANT rose, in consequence of the gentleman having appealed to him, not to enter into any discussion of the question presented by the amendment, but to speak of the facts which were within his knowledge. The statement made by the Speaker was substantially correct; it was also correct that the circumstance had occasioned considerable sensation among all parties in the city of Philadelphia. Mr. S. recapitulated the principal facts, adding, that the vessel in which these persons embarked was laden with munitions of war. As respected the views and intentions of the persons apprehended, Mr. S. said, he believed they had neither any intention nor any idea of violating the laws of the United States, and that their conduct had been perfectly decorous and correct. The court had thought they had offended against the act of Congress of the last session; or were so far at least of that opinion, that they thought it necessary to detain them. The bail demanded was not high; but they were not able to procure it, and were, therefore, committed to jail. It was because of the correct deportment of these persons, that the sentiment in their favor had been so general—but no complaint was made of the court, for which the same respect was entertained with which the Speaker himself had regarded it. He had mentioned these facts only that the House might, when the time came for acting on it, be aware of the construction put on the existing law, so far as any had been given.

The amendment moved by Mr. CLAY to the first resolution was agreed to without opposition.

The Committee of the Whole rose and reported their adoption of the several resolutions moved by Mr. TAYLOR, with the amendment; which the House agreed to, nem. con., and the committees were ordered to be appointed accordingly. They are as follow:

On so much of the President's Message as relates to Foreign Affairs.—Messrs. FORSYTH, HOLMES of Massachusetts, BARBOUR of Virginia, ROBERTSON of Louisiana, PORTER, ORR, and GOODWYN.

On Military Affairs.—Messrs. JOHNSON of Kentucky, BLOOMFIELD, REED, T. M. NELSON, NESBITT, FORNEY, and GAGE.

On the Militia.—Messrs. HARRISON, SMITH of Virginia, QUABLES, WILLIAMS of Connecticut, JONES, LINN, and MORTON.

On Naval Affairs.—Messrs. PLEASANTS, SILS-

BEE, WENDOVER, PARROTT, RINGGOLD, SAWYER, and SCHUYLER.

On Indian Affairs—Messrs. SOUTHARD, WILLIAMS of New York, MURRAY, SLOCUMB, BUTLER, RICHARDS, and TARR.

On Internal Improvement—Messrs. TUCKER of Virginia, TALLMADGE, INGHAM, STORRS, CLAGGETT, ROBERTSON of Kentucky, and LEWIS.

Respecting Amelia Island—Messrs. MIDDLETON, J. S. SMITH, UPHAM, SAWYER, BALL, MUMFORD, and COOK.

On the Public Buildings—Messrs. PARRIS, BASSETT, BELLINGER, TAYLOR, FORSYTH, FOLGER, and CRAFTS.

Respecting the surviving Revolutionary Patriots—Messrs. BLOOMFIELD, REED, STUART, RHEA, SMITH of Maryland, WALLACE, and HALL of North Carolina.

THURSDAY, December 4.

Three other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, HENRY BALDWIN; from Maryland, THOMAS BAYLEY; and from Virginia, JAMES JOHNSON, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of the managers of the Pennsylvania Hospital, praying the remission of the duties charged on the importation of a painting of "Christ healing in the Temple," which was presented by Benjamin West, of London, to the said hospital.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. COMSTOCK, the Committee on Military Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision, by law, for the commutation into money of the military bounty lands granted by Congress.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution, "for the admission of the State of Mississippi into the Union." They have also passed a resolution "for the appointment of a joint committee, to consist of three members of each House, who shall have the direction of the money appropriated for the purchase of books and maps for the use of the two Houses of Congress," and have appointed the committee on their part. And they have also passed a resolution for the appointment of two Chaplains to Congress, during the present session, one by each House, who shall interchange weekly; in which said resolutions they ask the concurrence of this House.

The resolution for the admission of the State of Mississippi into the Union was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole to-morrow.

The resolution for the appointment of a committee to have the direction of the money for the purchase of books, &c., was read, and concurred in by the House, and Messrs. SEYBERT, WHITMAN, and MIDDLETON, were appointed of the said committee on the part of this House.

The resolution for the appointment of Chaplains was read, and also concurred in by the House.

FRIDAY, December 5.

Two other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, WILLIAM MACLAY, and from Virginia, BALLARD SMITH, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

On motion of Mr. SEYBERT, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of revising and amending certain acts concerning the Mint establishment of the United States, and that they have leave to report by bill. Messrs. SEYBERT, BALDWIN, and IRVING, of New York, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. SOUTHARD, the House then proceeded to the appointment of a Chaplain for Congress on the part of this House, and the reverend Messrs. BALCH, CONE, LAURIE, ALLISON, CUMMING, ADDISON, and BROWN, were put in nomination. Two ballottings took place without an election; on the third, Mr. ALLISON received 84 votes, and was duly elected.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting the annual statements relative to the internal duties and direct tax, as required by the 33d section of the act of the 22d of July, 1813; which were ordered to lie on the table.

SPANISH AMERICAN PROVINCES.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, offered the following resolution for consideration:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to lay before the House of Representatives such information as he may possess and think proper to communicate, relative to the independence and political condition of the provinces of Spanish America.

The resolution having been read—

Mr. ROBERTSON said that he supposed there would be no objection to the adoption of the resolution which he had just submitted to the consideration of the House. He found, from the late Message of the President, that the attention of the House, as well as of the nation, had been, in a general way, directed to the situation of the provinces of Spanish America. The President had observed, too, and very truly, that the citizens of the United States sympathized in the events which affected their neighbors. Mr. R. said that, as far back as the year 1811, this subject had excited considerable interest; that a committee had been raised; the declaration of independence and the constitution of Venezuela, with other information, laid before it by the then President, and a report on them submitted to the House. The report, among other things, expressed much good will towards the Venezuelans, and an intention to acknowledge their independence whenever that independence should be achieved. From that time till the present, silence had been observed in regard to the affairs of that part of the continent. The reason was obvious: we were soon after engaged in war with England, and since the peace, our own pressing concerns had occupied our attention.

The President has spoken, sir, of the interest and the sympathy we feel in the affairs of our southern neighbors. Perhaps it may be said, with truth, that no subject excites, throughout the civilized world, a stronger interest than the contest in which the provinces of Spanish America are engaged. Every wind that blows wafts to our shores the schemes and speculations of European statesmen and politicians; from the frozen regions of the North to the milder climes of the Peninsula, it elicits remark and commands attention. Even Alexander, he who indites epistles about peace and bible societies, while he whets the sword of battle and prepares the weapons of destruction, he, it is said, is about to furnish his Cossacks to add to the horrors of, as it is already called, the war of death. The thunders of the Pope, too, the head of the Christian church, began to be heard, and no doubt we shall soon see his anathemas giving up the people of South America, body and soul, to the punishments due here and hereafter to the crimes of rebellion and republicanism. If, then, to governments across the Atlantic, the situation of this people be thus interesting, surely it is not a matter of surprise that the citizens of the United States should with some solicitude turn their attention towards them. Every Republican in the United States must lament their disasters and exult in their triumphs; they do but follow the example we have set them; we owe our glory and our fame to resistance to arbitrary power, and the people of Spanish America, and all others, groaning under oppression, must owe their elevation and worth of character to the same circumstance. They do but follow in our footsteps; it is in vain to deny or disguise the fact; it is known throughout the world—whatever of injury despotism or priestcraft have sustained, whether from the revolution of France, or that which now, I hope, flourishes in our hemisphere, is laid to the account of our glorious Revolution, and the excellent principles of our Constitution.

It is to be regretted, Mr. Speaker, that our acquaintance with the people of Spanish America is not more particular and intimate than it is: we entertain but one sentiment about them—our feelings are all in unison; yet we differ and dispute on a variety of points, which it is desirable should be no longer suffered to remain in doubt. Mexico, Peru, Chili, Buenos Ayres, Venezuela, New Grenada, are they independent? Are they struggling for independence, or have they yielded to their European tyrant? Have they made known their situation to the Executive Department? Have they demanded to be recognised as independent sovereignties? do they govern themselves? elect their agents, legislature, executive, and judiciary? lay and collect taxes, raise and support armies and navies? It is possible that these facts are in the possession of the President; it is very well known that there have been agents, men of high respectability, sent publicly from the governments of Venezuela, New Grenada, Buenos Ayres and Mexico, to this country, and, for anything I know to the contrary, from other provinces. It is probable that they have not remained silent, but whatever they may have said has not been made known to this House, or to this nation. As our Government is essentially popular, I wish information to be given to the people. I wish for information, that our judgments may sanction sentiments our hearts so warmly approve. I do not mean, Mr. Speaker, to commit myself in regard to my future course—it must, to a certain extent, depend upon circumstances. This House will act as circumstances may require, but, for myself, I have no hesitation to say, that, if it shall appear that the provinces of Spanish America, or any of them, are really independent, no earthly consideration shall prevent me, in my public character, from acknowledging them as sovereign States.

Mr. FORSYTH said he was too well acquainted with the temper of the people of the United States on this subject, to oppose any motion for inquiring into it; such was not his object; but he knew, from experience, that some inquiries were proper and some dangerous. In this case, he thought that all which could be known ought to be known; but he suggested to the mover of the resolution, whether it was not too broad in its call on the Executive, and whether it ought not to contain the usual qualification of excepting such information as the President might deem the communication of incompatible with the public interest. Mr. F. presumed the President had communicated all that he knew, or all that he wished Congress to know on the subject; and as it was usual in requesting information of the Executive, to ask for such only as the public interest would, in his opinion, permit to be disclosed, he proposed so to modify this motion; in which shape only could he consent to vote for it.

Mr. ROBERTSON signified his ready assent to Mr. FORSYTH's proposition.

The resolution passed nem. con. as modified, and a committee of two was appointed to wait on the President with it.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 8.

Several other members, to wit: from Massachusetts, JONATHAN MASON; from Virginia, ARCHIBALD AUSTIN and JOHN FLOYD; and from Ohio, PETER HITCHCOCK, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

NATHANIEL POPE, from the Illinois Territory, and JOHN SCOTT, from the Territory of Missouri, having also appeared, and produced their credentials as Delegates to represent the said Territories in the Fifteenth Congress of the United States, were also qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. BEECHER presented a petition of the ministers, elders, and sundry members of the Christian society called "Menonists," in the State of Ohio, praying to be permitted to commute the fines which are or may be imposed on them for non-performance of military duty, into labor on the public roads, highways, or other public improvements.—Referred to the committee on that part of the President's Message which relates to the Militia.

DECEMBER, 1817.

H. OF R.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, transmitting his annual report upon the state of the finances; which were referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, reported a bill authorizing a commutation of soldiers' bounty lands.

[The first section of this bill provides that the soldiers of the late and present army shall be allowed to commute their land patents or claims for money, at the rate of one dollar and forty cents per acre, to be paid in four annual instalments, by the pension agents appointed in the several States; provided that there be in all cases a complete relinquishment of all claims on said lands by the commutators to the United States. The second section of the bill makes the appropriation necessary to carry the first into effect.]

The bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON, also, from the committee to whom had been referred the petition of John Bates, reported a bill for his relief; which received the usual course of two readings and commitment.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making Darien, in the State of Georgia, a port of entry and delivery.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, a joint resolution was passed to a third reading authorizing a distribution of the new edition of the laws of the Union to such members of the present Congress as have not received them.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, of Indiana, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing Joel Earwood to transfer to other vacant lands in the Jeffersonville district any moneys he may have paid on the northeast quarter of section twenty-one, township six, and range nine in said district.

On motion of Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the resolution from the Senate for admitting the State of Mississippi into the Union. The constitution of the State having been read through at the suggestion of Mr. TAYLOR, the Committee rose and reported their agreement to the resolution; which was then read a third time and finally passed.

AMELIA ISLAND AND SPANISH PATRIOTS.

Mr. RHEA offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President be requested to lay before the House of Representatives any information he may possess, and think proper to communicate, relative to the proceedings of certain persons who took possession of Amelia Island, at the mouth of the St. Mary's river, near the boundary of the State of Georgia, in the Summer of the present year, and made an establishment there; and also any information he hath, and may think proper to communicate, relative to an establishment made, at an earlier period, by persons of the same description, in the Gulf of Mexico, at a place called Galveston, within the limits of the United States, as we contend, under the cession of Louisiana; together with the reasons inducing him to issue orders to suppress the said establishments.

Mr. RHEA said that the establishments referred to in the resolution he had just offered, had already excited much attention throughout the country, which would be still more attracted to that point by the order given to suppress them. His object in offering this motion was to obtain such information as might satisfy the minds of the American people on the expediency of that measure.

Mr. FORSYTH moved to strike out the last clause of the proposed resolutions. It would be an extraordinary course for the House to ask for the reasons of the measure in question, when they were distinctly and satisfactorily avowed in the Message of the President. To call upon him, after that exposition to explain the reasons for his conduct, would be to cast a severe reflection on the Executive, as implying dissatisfaction at the reasons already given. For his own part, Mr. F. said, the conduct of the Executive appeared to him to have been perfectly correct; but he had no objection to any information desired, if asked for, unconnected with the clause he had excepted to.

Mr. HUGH NELSON of Virginia, twice addressed the House on the main subject of the resolution, but, being interrupted in his remarks by incidental circumstances, we have connected his observations in the following report of the substance of them. A few remarks are added, which the interruptions referred to, prevented him from making. Mr. N. was decidedly in favor of the motion. Like the honorable SPEAKER, who had alluded to this matter when in Committee of the Whole the other day, Mr. N. said, he felt his confidence in the Executive not diminished; like him, he felt confident that the measure of the suppression of these establishments, was founded, in their opinion, in a just sense of propriety, and in a desire to promote the public weal: and he believed that, for the satisfaction of the public, and for a just vindication of the Executive, these documents should be exhibited. I cannot but believe, said he, that the public will see, that, in this measure, the conduct of the Government has been marked by a due respect to the rights of the Spanish provinces, and a vigilant and prompt attention to the rights and interests of our own country. It is the best interest of the Spanish provinces, embarked in the noble cause of emancipating themselves, to give evidence to the world, that all their proceedings are the result of just and sound principles; to repel and refute, by a high-minded and maganimous conduct, the malignant and calumnious representations, which would place them in the grade of savages and barbarians. A just regard to the opinions of the civilized world; a due estimate of their own dignity and self respect, will lead them to disclaim all connexion with these piratical establishments. Their own interest would lead them to co-operate in the extinction of these hordes of buccaneers. There was a time when the union of McGregor, distinguished by his gallant exertions in the patriot cause of the Spanish provinces, with their naval commander Aury, and supported by some of the high-minded and gallant spirits of our own late military establishment, might have led to the opinion that it was a bold and valorous enterprise, to wrest from their oppressors a portion of their territory, and bravely to wage the war in the assailable dominions of the Spanish monarch. But the moment for that opinion is gone by—McGregor has abandoned them. Posey, and the other gallant spirits of this country, no more give color to the enterprise. And have they not themselves given further proofs, if proofs are wanting, that they are but a horde of buccaneers, invading our own territory, and plundering our own citizens? See the accounts from Savannah. To believe that these settlements are sanctioned by the Patriots, would be to degrade them from the high and dignified station which they hold in our estimation. That the Patriots should themselves countenance such establishments, would be further to descend from the highest pinnacle of honorable elevation, to the lowest abyss of humiliation and contempt. Men embarked in the glorious and magnanimous struggle for freedom and the rights of man, can never stoop to the condition of buccaneers, banditti, and pirates.

That the pulse of every lover of freedom should beat high, in sympathy with the asserters of the rights of man in every region, is consonant to the nature of man; but that ours should throb with delight at the success, and recoil to the heart on the defeat, of our neighbors, our brothers, inhabiting the same continent, migrating thither about the same period, and under circumstances very similar—with our brothers who were lately suffering, as we did, from the cold and unfeeling oppressions produced on them by their kindred and their friends—is surely not to be wondered at. Similitude of sufferance in a similar and virtuous cause, will find no limit to its feeling. But feeling will not give us the correct standard whereby the course and conduct of the legislators intrusted with the guardianship of the rights and interests of their constituents, but just now successfully emerged from the same arduous and exalted struggle, should be regulated. This feeling must be tempered with sound discretion. Experience must teach us a little prudence. Who is there amongst us, of the most ardent of those whose feelings beat most high in the cause of revolutionary France, and who were most violent in denouncing the conduct and pacific policy of the great Father of his Country, for attempting to restrain those feelings within the limits of a sound and discreet prudence, who did not, when experience had shown us the mad policy of implicating our destinies with hers, who did not offer homage to the wisdom, virtue, and patriotism of that great man? I was one of those who, as loudly as any other, denounced the proclamation of neutrality, and the—as we then called it—arbitrary, illegal, and unconstitutional interference of the Executive, to restrain us from co-operating with our allies in the cause of freedom and the rights of man. The sagacity and virtue of the patriot now receives that homage and respect which the wild extravagances and ardent intemperance of youth then most vehemently denied. So will posterity act and decide, as to the conduct of our present Administration. However amiable and estimable this ardent sympathy with our Southern brethren, nobly redeeming themselves from an oppressive and odious bondage, may appear, yet a course dictated by sound discretion, and guided by caution and prudence, in an Administration, must meet their approbation. Although some among us may see, in the conduct of the Administration, a one-sided policy; may see, in every one of their acts, from the proclamation of 1815, issued to suppress an expedition said to be organizing in Louisiana, to the order of suppressing the establishments at Amelia Island and Galveston, that all those acts have been on one side; that they all bore against the provinces, against the cause in which the Patriots are engaged; yet, sir, I cannot doubt, that when this course shall be calmly and dispassionately scanned and examined, the judgment of the American people, and of an impartial posterity, will applaud the course, and see in it the result of a wise, virtuous, and patriotic policy. They will discern, in the proclamation issued by Mr. Madison, and in his declarations to the Spanish Minister, that the flag of the Patriots in our ports should be equally respected with every other, nothing but a determined adherence to the dictates of a just and impartial neutrality. They will see in the course of policy pursued by the new Administration, as marked out to us in the President's Message, that the conduct of the Government has been most conciliatory and friendly; as friendly as it could be without engaging in the war on their side. In the declaration, that this contest is regarded, not in the light of an ordinary insurrection or rebellion, but as a civil war between parties nearly equal, having, as to neutral Powers, equal rights, our Government has gone before every Power, and has advanced, in an eminent degree, the interests of the provinces. It has given them countenance, and will increase for them the respect of other nations. The measure now taken is a strong one in their favor. The President, in his Message, has spoken of their rights as being equal to those of Spain. He has sent agents to communicate with them as the Governments de facto, and has declared the right of this Government to hold such communications with the provincial authorities. The agents are, it is true, informal, and have no commissions; yet their communications will be not the less respected. Going thither in a vessel of war, will give the stamp of authority to these communications, and cause them to be well received and attended to. This measure in itself, goes far towards a recognition of their independence; it is everything but an express acknowledgment. It gives them the advantages of such acknowledgment, without its disadvantages, and also without too great a commitment of the United States. The other part of the Message, which declares that the United States will not profit of their independence, will have a beneficial effect in favor of the provinces. It will dissipate the jealousies of England, and other Powers, and lessen the desire, on their part, to oppose the independence of the provinces. The Government has, therefore, done all that a wise policy and a benevolent feeling towards the provinces could require. They have, also, obeyed the imperious duty of a just neutrality. In the determination to require nothing peculiarly advantageous to the United States to be conceded, on the part of the provinces, a proper regard is had to their situation, and to the embarrassments under which they might be thrown by any undue concessions made. We all recollect, with grateful feelings, the conduct of France towards us in our Revolutionary struggle; but we all remember, too, the embarrassments experienced by us during their revolution, from the guarantee which, by treaty, we had made of their West India possessions. It is wished that the provinces should never be placed in a situation similar to ours, so as thereafter to be subject to any embarrassment from stipulations made by them. They are to be left free to consult their own best interest, and their own true policy. The daily intelligence which we receive from the Island of Amelia, proves the wisdom and prudence of our Government in endeavoring to suppress these establishments. The world will do homage to the magnanimity and justice of the Spanish provinces in renouncing all connexion with these settlements. It will raise the character of the United States, by showing their determination to put down all piratical establishments; that the movements of a people contending for their liberties, are totally different from the establishments of pirates and buccaneers. In entertaining the opinion that the provinces never sanctioned them, as is believed, we show respect to the colonies, and raise their character. It is the interest of the colonies to disavow them, and thereby raise their character with us and with the European Governments. It cannot be doubted they will disavow them, and they amongst us who stimulate them to an opposite policy, are not their real friends, but their worst enemies.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, said he should never be opposed to any call for information on any subject, when wanted by the House. But it appeared to him that the call now proposed was unnecessary, since the resolution adopted the other day would embrace the information now desired. He thought the House should wait a day or two, to see whether they would not obtain, without any further call, all the information they desired from the Executive. With this view he moved that the resolution should lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON opposed the motion, urging some of the arguments comprehended in the above substantial statement of his remarks, as a reason against delay.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, read the resolution adopted the other day, calling for information respecting the state of the colonies of Spain in South America, that gentlemen might judge whether it comprehended the information now desired. It might be that, under this resolution, the President would consider that East Florida formed a portion of the colonies of South America, as well as any other province; and would transmit therefore all the information required in relation to Amelia Island, &c. Yielding to the suggestion of the gentleman from Massachusetts, that in a day or two the House would receive the information desired, Mr. R. thought it would be as well to let the resolution lie until the President's answer to the other call should be received. If that did not comprise the desired information, this resolution might then be taken up and passed.

Mr. MILLER, of South Carolina, was opposed to the proposed postponement of this motion; the objects of which and of that which passed the other day, he said, were totally distinct. The object of that was to inquire into the political state of the Spanish colonies; the design of this was to satisfy the nation that the Executive had acted on sufficient grounds in the course it had taken in regard to Amelia Island and Galveston. This, he said, was a reason sufficient to induce him to vote against laying the resolution on the table. If that motion should not prevail, he should vote for the amendment proposed by Mr. FORSYTH, because the facts on which it was founded would certainly disclose the reasons of the measure. The Speaker had the other day intimated, on the floor of this House, his opinion that every act of the Government, from the proclamation against the expedition said to be fitting out at New Orleans in 1815, to the present day, had been hostile to the Spanish Patriots. Now, Mr. M. said, he looked upon the information called for by the resolution as necessary to repel the reproach, from so high a source, thus thrown on the Government. He therefore hoped the resolve would be suffered to pass.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he had not understood the Speaker, in debate the other day, to have intimated that every act of the Government had been hostile to the Patriot cause; but that they had leaned to one side of the question; had borne more against the Patriots than against Spain. And, if our acts had any operation at all, who could deny, Mr. J. asked, that what the Speaker had said, was the fact? Was not the proclamation of 1815 of that nature? It was issued in consequence of representations of the Spanish Minister. Being issued at his instance, if it had any bearing at all, must it not have had a leaning against the Spanish Patriots? With regard to the seizure of Amelia Island, if that measure had any operation at all in regard to the two parties, must it not be against the Patriots? Theirs, he said, was a cause which he would not now advocate; but the sentiment avowed by the Speaker was his sentiment; one which he would avow in this House and every where; that whenever our acts had had a tendency to one side or the other, it was to the injury of the Patriots. Not that the Speaker meant to say, any more than himself, that our Government intended hostility to that cause; for, Mr. J.

said, he understood him to have unequivocally said, he had no doubt it would appear that the reasons of the Executive for the measure in question had been sufficient to justify it. Mr. J. was in favor of laying the resolution on the table, until it was ascertained whether the resolution was or was not necessary, in addition to that passed the other day.

Mr. RHEA opposed the motion to lay this resolution on the table, contending that its object was totally distinct from that passed the other day. That proposed an inquiry into the state of foreign nations: this proposed an inquiry into our own concerns—into a matter perhaps embracing a question of peace or war, and on which therefore Congress ought to have full information. If not laid on the table, Mr. R. said he should have no hesitation in voting for the amendment proposed by Mr. FORSYTH.

Mr. HARRISON said that he hoped the resolution would not be permitted to lie upon the table, but that it would be sent to the President for the purpose of obtaining a more detailed account of the circumstances which led to the order for occupying Amelia Island than the Message at the opening of the session contained. The reasons assigned in the Message were not, in his estimation, sufficient to authorize that measure. That which seemed to be most relied upon was, that a negotiation was pending between this country and Spain, for the cession to us of their claim to the Floridas; a fact which, being known to the whole world, ought to have prevented the South American Patriots from attempting any military enterprise against them. Mr. H. said that he could not see the subject in this light.

If, as he believed, Amelia Island gave to the belligerent party which possessed it, a decided advantage in harassing the commerce of the other, he could not conceive that any delicacy towards us, in consequence of the pending negotiation alluded to, should have prevented their taking it. In the unequal contest in which they are engaged—unequal from the disparity of aid and countenance which they have received from all the Governments of the civilized world—they have a right to resort to a measure which would produce great advantages to them, and which was not forbidden by any known maxim of the law of nations. Belligerents sometimes, indeed, in defiance of that law, will occupy a neutral territory, in anticipation of a supposed intention of their adversary. But in this case the territory was not neutral; it was the property of Spain, in the possession of Spain, and a fair object for the martial enterprise of the Patriots. And if, said Mr. H., they had succeeded in conquering all the Spanish part of the Floridas, he did not doubt but it would be as easy to obtain it from them as from the King of Spain. Mr. H. fully agreed with the sentiment expressed the other day by the SPEAKER, that, however well intended or necessary—and he had no doubt that they were well intended, and perhaps necessary—had been the acts of our Government in relation to the war between Spain and her colonies, he was constrained to believe that they had borne with unequal pressure upon the cause of the Patriots.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, said he regarded the information sought by the resolution as exceedingly important. The fact of the suppression of the establishments at those places so often referred to, attracted the attention of the nation; and he was therefore in favor of the earliest official information on the subject, that the House might understand on what grounds the Executive of the United States had undertaken to suppress these establishments. Mr. H. was, however, of opinion that this resolution was unnecessary, being embraced in the general call made a few days ago, for information on the political state of the Spanish provinces, of which East Florida, embracing Amelia Island, was one: and the same reasoning would apply to Galveston, situated on territory equally claimed by Spain and the United States. If, however, the information now desired should not be necessary, Mr. H. said he should be one of the first to vote for it, considering it highly important. The intention to seize on these establishments had struck him with some surprise, he said, when first informed of the fact; but he had no doubt the reasons for the measure would prove satisfactory to all. He would go with any gentleman, at any time, into an inquiry into the conduct of the Executive; but he thought gentlemen were going too fast now to call specifically for information which it was probable might reach the House before this second call could reach the President. He therefore hoped it would be laid on the table.

The question to lay the resolution on the table was then taken: For the motion 75; against it 81. So the motion was lost.

Mr. RHEA having accepted Mr. FORSYTH's proposed amendment as part of his own motion, the main question was taken on the resolution, and decided in the affirmative, without a division; and a committee ordered to be appointed to wait on the President therewith.

TUESDAY, December 9.

Another member, to wit: ELIAS EARLE, from the State of South Carolina, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. MCCOY presented a petition of Peter Stone and Mary his wife, an honest couple in his district, who represent that they have been united in wedlock's happy bonds for seven and twenty years, in which time they have added to our population twenty children, nineteen of whom are living, and whom they have maintained by the product of their manual labor. Conceiving themselves entitled to the favor of Congress on that score, they pray for a donation of public land, to make their declining years more easy to them. The petition was referred to the Committee on Public Lands.

A petition was presented from C. Hammond, contesting the election of Mr. HERRICK, of Ohio, a member of this House, on the ground of his having, at the time of his election, and until a few days before he took his seat here, held the office of Attorney of the United States for the district of Ohio. This petition was read, and referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, to which was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to revenue, made a report thereon, which was read; when Mr. L. reported a bill to abolish the internal duties; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SEYBERT, from the select committee appointed on the 5th instant, reported a bill, supplementary to the act establishing the Mint, and to the act concerning the Mint, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Richard Bland Lee, Commissioner of Claims under the act of the 9th of April, 1816, communicating "reports of the facts," in the cases of Thaddeus Mayhew, of Louisiana; of William Eadus, of New York; and of the executor of Mrs. George Thompson, deceased, of Virginia; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

On motion of Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia,

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House of Representatives information of what roads have been made, or are in progress, under the Executive authority of the United States; the States and Territories through which they pass or are intended to pass; the periods when they were ordered to be made, and how far they have been executed.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, offered a resolution, with a view to enable him to act understandingly on the Commutation bill; which, after some desultory conversation as to the particular form of it, was adopted in the following shape:

"Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to communicate to this House the number of warrants issued for military bounty lands, by virtue of any laws of Congress, to soldiers who served during the late war against Great Britain; the quantity of land included in those warrants; and the probable quantity of land which will yet be necessary to satisfy claims for bounty lands under those laws."

The engrossed resolution, directing a distribution of certain laws among the members of the Fifteenth Congress, was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, after referring to cases within his knowledge, in which minors who served in the late army had not, because of their minority, received a bounty in land on their discharge from the army, moved the following resolution:

"Resolved, That it is expedient to provide by law, that all minors who were regularly enlisted, in the late or present Army of the United States, and who served twelve months or upwards, and have been honorably discharged, shall be entitled to an adequate bounty in land, or to an adequate commutation of such bounty in money."

This resolve was referred to the same Committee of the Whole, to whom were referred Mr. JOHNSON's resolutions.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the apprehending and securing foreign seamen, deserting from foreign vessels while in the ports of the United States, contrary to their engagements to serve on board such vessels.

Mr. W. made a few observations, to show the necessity of such a regulation as that which he now proposed, arising from its expediency, and demanded also by reciprocity. A similar provision existed, he said, in all foreign ports, by which our masters of vessels were able to secure their seamen; and our laws secured to our own vessels in our ports the like privilege. It was obviously expedient, therefore, to extend this provision to foreign vessels also, in regard to which it was more necessary, and to which the remedy was not applicable, unless in cases where it had been erroneously applied by a misapprehension of the law in the case.

The resolution was adopted without opposition.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Tennessee, moved a resolution instructing the Committee on Pensions to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law an office for the payment of pensions and Revolutionary claims, within the district of West Tennessee.

Mr. C. explained the object of his motion; which was predicated on the fact, that owing to the location of the pension agent for Tennessee, a person in West Tennessee having business with him might with more ease resort to this city, could it be here transacted, than he could travel to the residence of the agent, &c.

The motion was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. TAYLOR, of New York,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of exempting from taxation the military bounty lands in the Missouri and Illinois Territories, for five years after the patents therefor have been issued.

On motion of Mr. INGHAM, of Pennsylvania, the committee on post roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Fort Montgomery, in Monroe county, in Alabama Territory, to Blakely, in Mobile county: and,

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont, the same committee were instructed to inquire as to establishing a post road from Burlington to Craftsbury, thence through Strasburgh to Barton, in Vermont.

On motion of Mr. McCox, of Virginia,

Resolved, That the Committee of Ways and Means be instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing the law laying a duty on imported salt, granting a bounty on pickled fish exported, and allowing a bounty to vessels employed in the fisheries.

THE JUDICIARY.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Tennessee, moved the adoption of the following resolution :

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire whether any, and, if any, what alterations and amendments are necessary to be made in the Judiciary.

Mr. C. said, that perhaps no subject would come before the House at the present session, of more importance to the people, than that embraced in his motion. A good Judiciary is certainly indispensable to protect the rights and interests of the people. That certainly cannot be said to be a good one which fails to administer justice. Such, however, Mr. C. said, was the fact in regard to the country he represented. One circuit judge was assigned to Kentucky, Tennessee, and Ohio: the labors of that circuit were too herculean for the constitution of any man whatever. The consequence was, that in Tennessee, being the last district in the judge's circuit, where the cases before the court are numerous and important, there were no trials—for the last five years there had not been perhaps twenty causes disposed of. The time of the judge was so divided as to make it impossible for him to devote the necessary time to the court in Tennessee. Unless some remedy was provided, there was in that State an operative denial of justice as to the laws of the United States. It was unnecessary for him, he said, to go now into detail, and state what alterations in his opinion ought to be made in the judiciary system. That was a wide field, which he had no doubt would be properly explored by the committee having that subject in charge, and fully acquainted with its merits. He hoped that something would at least be done for the relief of the people of Tennessee.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, rose, merely to mention the fact, that, at the last session of Congress, two important bills had been reported on this subject by the judiciary committee, but not acted on by the House. He invited the attention of gentlemen to these bills, to see how nearly or remotely they approached to their ideas of a necessary reform of the judiciary.

Mr. CLAIBORNE's motion was agreed to.

MILITARY ESTABLISHMENTS.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, with a view to ascertain the sense of the House on certain points, that the labors of the Military Committee should not be unnecessarily troublesome to the House, and laborious to themselves, submitted the following resolutions to the consideration of the House:

1. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for the widows of soldiers of the regular army, who were killed in battle, or died in service, during the late war with Great Britain.

2. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for the disbanded and deranged officers of the Army of the United States, who served in the late war against Great Britain, by donations in land, viz: to a major general, 1,280 acres; a brigadier general, 1,120 acres; a colonel and lieutenant colonel, 960 acres each; a major, 800 acres; a captain, 640 acres; and subalterns, 480 acres.

3. Resolved, That it is expedient to establish, by law, three additional Military Academies, viz: one in the vicinity of Fort Dearborn, in South Carolina; one in the vicinity of Newport, in Kentucky; and one in the vicinity of Harper's Ferry, in Virginia; one-third of the cadets to be the sons of the officers and soldiers of the late army, who died in the service of the United States in the late war.

4. Resolved, That it is expedient to establish, by law, an additional National Armory, to be located on the western waters.

5. Resolved, That it is expedient to organize, by law, a corps of invalids, to be composed of one thousand men.

6. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for the repeal of so much of an act of Congress, of the sixth of July, 1812, as authorizes additional pay and emoluments to brevet rank, in the armies of the United States.

7. Resolved, That the Military Peace Establishment of the United States shall consist of eight thousand men, including the corps of invalids: Provided, That the corps of engineers, the general staff, and the ordnance department, shall be retained as at present established: And provided, also, That no part of the army shall be disbanded in consequence of said reduction, but the same shall be effected by permitting vacancies, as they occur, to remain.

8. Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for one additional ration for each of the commissioned officers of the Army of the United States.

9. Resolved, That the Committee on the subject of Military Affairs be instructed to report bills, embracing the objects of the beforementioned resolutions.

Mr. JOHNSON accompanied the introduction of these resolutions with a number of remarks appropriate to them individually and as a whole. The first he considered as bottomed upon the principles of consistency and impartiality, which ought to belong to the acts of the Government; which required that the provision made for the widows and orphans of the militia should be extended to those of the soldiers in the Regular Army of the United States. The second resolution embraced a proposition heretofore repeatedly presented to the consideration of the House, and in the adoption of which he thought justice and the honor of the nation were concerned. It had been ascertained to a certainty, he said, what number of officers had been disbanded, and what number retained; and, from a calculation which had been accurately made, it appeared that less than a million acres of land would be required to extend these donations to the officers of the late army, whilst the bounty of land to the privates of that army would require about eight millions of acres. The subject of the Military Academy, repeatedly recommended to Congress by the Executive, and favorably reported on by committees of this House, which was the subject of his third resolution, Mr. J. said, he thought it his duty again to present to the House. In the provision respecting the sons of deceased officers and soldiers of the late army, he had not included the Revolutionary army, because there were no instances in which the provision could probably operate. The proposition contained in the fourth resolution had been likewise frequently presented to the attention of Congress by the Executive, and by committees of the House. The measure it embraced he considered as of vital importance, appealing to the affections and humanity of the House, and one which, he was happy to say, had never been rejected in the House, but always crushed by the weight of more urgent measures towards the close of the sessions. The fifth resolution he had presented out of respect to the decision of the House at the last session on the same subject, which decision had been arrested in the other branch of the Legislature, but which he again presented, as it might now meet a different fate. The ground of the proposition was, that brevet rank had its basis in honor and not in emolument, which was now incorrectly attached to it. The sixth resolution, for the reduction of the Army, Mr. J. considered as growing out of those he had already offered. He had often seen, since he had a seat on this floor, that members had refused to vote for a particular proposition without an equivalent, or something like a system, which would make an objectionable proposition palatable. As the other propositions he had offered embraced some additional expenditures, he had thought it his duty to propose a reduction of the rank and file of the army to 8,000, to afford, without added expense, the opportunity of establishing these new institutions, which would strengthen the arm of the Government much more than the proposed reduction would weaken it. For, he said, he believed that the several propositions he had made, adopted together, would be worth to the United States, at any time it had occasion for them, full thirty thousand men. The seventh proposition was a renewal of one which had been agitated at the last session of Congress, and in regard to which the War Department had fully coincided with the military committee, that such a provision would not only be very convenient, but likewise economical to the United States. In regard to the eighth and last resolution, Mr. J. said it had been the opinion of the late Secretary of War (Mr. Crawford) that, in order to keep up to its complement the army of 10,000 men, it would be necessary to augment not only the pay of the officers but of the soldiers; one of these objects he had introduced into his series of propositions. In presenting these resolutions, Mr. J. concluded by saying, he had no apology to make to the House; he had only to consult his own bosom what his duty urged him to do, and act accordingly, never making any motion in this House with a view to give trouble to it, &c.

The several resolutions were received, and referred to a Committee of the Whole House for consideration.

WEDNESDAY, December 10.

On motion of Mr. POPE, the petition of sundry inhabitants of the Territory of Illinois, concerning land titles, confirmed by former governors of the northwestern territories, presented on the 14th of January, 1817, and the petition of sundry inhabitants of Prairie du Chien, presented on the 24th of January, 1817, were referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented sundry documents in support of the petition of Gabriel Winter, which were also referred to the same committee.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the petition of sundry inhabitants of the river Raisin, presented on the 6th of February, 1817, were referred to a select committee; and Messrs. HARRISON, FLOYD, and BALDWIN, were appointed the committee.

Mr. NEWTON, from the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures, reported a bill to remit the duty on a painting presented to the Pennsylvania Hospital; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from Richard Bland Lee, Commissioner of Claims, under the act of the 9th of April, 1810, communicating "reports of the facts" in the cases of William T. Nimmo, Joseph Janney, Lawrence Muse, and William Gordon, William Henderson, and Mottram Ball, all of the State of Virginia; of John I. Pattison, Benjamin H. Mackall, John Manning, John G. Mackall, Mary Frazier, Levy court of Calvert county, and John Ireland, all of the State of Maryland, with the evidence accompanying each; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, enclosing reports upon the petitions of Winslow and Henry Lewis, and Joseph Forrest, referred to him at the last session of Congress; which were referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, enclosing an account of the fund appropriated for the safe-keeping and accommodation of prisoners of war, conformably to the provisions of the act of the 3d of March, 1817; which were ordered to lie on the table.

REPRESENTATIVE QUALIFICATIONS.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, offered for consideration the following resolution, to obtain a decision on a question raised by a memorial yesterday presented, contesting the election of a member from Ohio, and which Mr. F. considered of great importance:

Resolved, That the Committee of Elections be instructed to inquire and report what persons elected to serve in the House of Representatives have accepted or held offices under the Government of the United States since the 4th day of March, 1817, and how far their right to a seat in this House is affected thereby.

The adoption of this resolution was warmly opposed by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, and Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, and was also opposed by Mr. SEYBERT, of Pennsylvania, Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, and Mr. W. P. MACLAY, of Pennsylvania, and was supported by Mr. FORSYTH.

It was opposed as a novel proceeding, imposing inconvenient and extraordinary duties on the Committee of Elections, by requiring them to go through the alphabet from A to Z, and inquire into the qualifications of every member of the House. It was also opposed as imputing impurity to the House, not justly attributable to it; since the fact of taking the oath to support the Constitution was prima facie evidence that the member taking it was conscious of having violated no provision of that instrument. If we inquire into the qualifications of members, why not also into others, equally prescribed by the Constitution? It was time enough to inquire into the rights of members to their seats, when any specific allegation was made as to the want of qualification of any one or more of them.

To which the mover (Mr. FORSYTH) replied, by expressing his surprise at the opposition to his motion. There was nothing in it, he said, which accused any part of this House, or any member of it, of improper conduct. It neither charged the House with suffering members to remain who ought not, nor any member of the House with remaining when he ought not. The object was to inquire whether persons in certain situations had a right to a seat or not. It was presumed that those gentlemen so situated had examined their own rights, and were convinced of their title to seats here. But as he very much doubted the right of any person so situated to a seat in this House, he wished to have the question settled. If the House should be of his opinion, he should see with great regret any gentleman so situated return even temporarily to his constituents—for temporarily he was sure it would be, and that the House would at the next session, if not at the close of this, have the aid of their judgments and abilities. As to specifying the members who would fall under this rule, Mr. F. said he did not know all there were; he had been informed that there were ten or eleven members, whose right to a seat depended on the decision of this question—he did not know them; if he did, he should have no objection to comprehend their names in his motion. He concluded his observations by disclaiming the intention to impute the least blame to gentlemen who had taken their seats under these circumstances; for they had no doubt satisfied themselves on the question.

The question on the resolution was taken, when there appeared in favor of the resolution 85, against it 85.

The House being equally divided, the SPEAKER, assigning as his reason his desire to have the Constitutional question fully investigated, voted in favor of the motion; which was therefore adopted.

REPEAL OF INTERNAL DUTIES.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to abolish the internal duties.

The report of the Committee of Ways and Means, which accompanied the bill, is in the following words:

The Committee of Ways and Means, to whom has been referred so much of the President's Message as respects revenue, report—

That they have supposed that they should best comply with the intentions of the House, by directing their first attention to the repeal of the internal duties, which occupied its deliberations during the latter part of its last session, and has been since recommended by the President. From the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, it appears that the clear revenue which will have accrued during the year 1817, will be about twenty-four millions and a half of dollars, while the ordinary annual expenditure, (including the provision for the extinguishment of the public debt,) is estimated at less than twenty-one millions and a half. While the committee do not consider the importations of the last three years as furnishing a certain criterion for those of future years, they believe, that, without a diminution of our exports, which is not to be anticipated, or a very considerable reduction in their value, the estimate of a revenue under the present laws, of $24,525,000, as made by the Secretary of the Treasury, may be safely relied on for many succeeding years. No doubt can be entertained, under the circumstances of the United States, as to the propriety of reducing a revenue so far exceeding their ordinary expenses, and the committee recommend a general repeal of the internal duties. This will leave, according to the estimates of the Secretary, a revenue of about twenty-two millions, exceeding the ordinary expenditure by something more than half a million.

Some difficulties will always be found in determining the period at which the collection of a tax shall cease. The consideration, however, of the large proportion of the internal duties which will become payable in January, induces the committee to recommend that all internal duties should terminate with the year 1817.

The entire amount which will have accrued to the Government on account of the internal duties, exclusive of the direct tax, from the 1st of January, 1814, to the 31st of December, 1817, may be estimated at more than seventeen millions, and the receipts for the same time at upwards of fifteen millions.

The following statement will show the receipts of each of the three first years, with an estimate of those of the fourth year.

Accruing duties.	Duties received.
1814—3,262,197 12 -	- 1,910,995 01
1815—6,242,503 55 -	- 4,976,529 86
1816—4,633,799 34 -	- 5,281,111 98
1817—3,002,000 01 -	- 3,000,000 00
Total, 17,140,500 00 -	- 15,168,636 85

Expenses of collection on sums received.

1814—148,991 78, or 7 8-10 per cent.
1815—279,277 67, or 5 6-10 do.
1816—253,440 42, or 4 8-10 do.
1817—180,000 00, or 6 do.

Total, 861,709 87, or 5 7-10 per cent.

The charges of collection upon this revenue have certainly been higher than those upon the impost. These have, however, been very different at different time. Mr. Gallatin estimated them, in 1800, at something less than six per cent. on moneys collected from the people. Mr. Dallas, in one of his reports, supposes them, including fees, to be about five per cent.

DECEMBER, 1817.

Repeal of Internal Duties.

H. OF R.

and they have been still lower in the three last years. This difference in the expense of collecting internal and foreign duties, will not appear extraordinary, when we remember how few are the domestic products, which are subject to duty, and of foreign, which are exempt from it; how long and regularly the impost has been acquiring maturity and improvement, and how frequent have been the changes, and how short the duration of our system of internal revenue.

In abandoning that portion of our taxes which is considered as the most inconvenient, neither Congress nor the nation will form so exaggerated a notion of these inconveniences, as to deter them from again applying to the same resource, when the necessities of the State shall require it. It is one of the duties of Congress to provide, when it can do so, that the revenue shall be collected from sources which may comport with public convenience; but it is a higher duty to provide, from whatever sources the Constitution may have opened to its operation, such a revenue as shall not permit the fate of war, and the most important interests of the nation, to depend on precarious and often extravagant loans. The Government can have no reasonable fear but that the circumstances which make internal taxes necessary, will find in the people a disposition promptly to pay them. The committee believe that in any future emergency, which shall require a resort to these taxes, the House of Representatives will, unhesitatingly, perform their peculiar duty, by instituting them on a scale suited to the occasion.

The bill having been read through—

Mr. LOWNDES, the chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, made a few remarks of the same bearing as the reasoning of the above report. He took occasion also to say, that it was due to candor and to himself to add, that he should have individually thought it better, instead of a total repeal, to have made a modification of the duties, so as to reduce their amount and lighten their burden, but still to leave part of the system in operation. Believing, however, that the expectation of the total repeal was such as to render vain any attempt to discriminate, or to modify, he had concurred in the course adopted by the committee of recommending a total repeal, in preference to retaining the whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, heartily concurred in the sentiment of the gentleman from South Carolina, that these taxes ought not to be retained for the purpose of adding to the surplus in the Treasury. He rejoiced that, whether gentlemen voted on the subject from the spontaneous determination of their own minds, or the recommendation of the Executive, the taxes were to be repealed. He congratulated the country, that from this time the people would be exempted from a system as unequal in its operation as it was unjust. Our citizens, he said, had sustained it with a patience and long suffering which was remarkable, and afforded a pledge that, should it be necessary hereafter again to resort to internal taxes, the Government might do so, and trust to the good sense of the people for their justification. The people, he argued, were always willing to pay taxes, when the necessity of them was apparent. But, for more than a year past, that necessity had not existed for the internal duties, and, therefore, the people had demanded the repeal of them. Mr. W. referred to the estimates of the revenue from imposts, for the present and last years, to show that the actual product had nearly doubled the estimate, as had been shown and predicted by the gentleman from Virginia, who was his able coadjutor at the last session, (Mr. JOHNSON,) and himself. He mentioned these facts, he said, to show that, if there was any blame anywhere for the occurrences of last session having reference to this subject—and blame had been imputed—the blame belonged to those who opposed the repeal of the taxes at that time, and not to those who advocated it. We rejoice, now, said Mr. W., that the President has thought proper to recommend the measure, and that there appears to be an unanimous disposition at this time favorable to it.

No further remarks being made on the general object of the bill—

Mr. TALLMADGE, of New York, moved to amend the bill so as to except the duties on sales at auction from the general repeal proposed. He assigned as a reason for this motion, that he believed that tax to have a beneficial operation, as imposing an additional burden, however small, on foreign products, protecting the fair dealer, and so far also serving as an encouragement to our manufactures.

Mr. LOWNDES opposed the motion, though not unaware of the beneficial effects imputed to the duty on sales at auctions, in which he himself, in a degree, believed. But he opposed the retaining it, because it would require the machinery of taxation to be retained for this object, making the collection of the duty very expensive and inconvenient to the Government. The benefits arising to the community from the tax, he said, would not probably be lost, for he believed, that when the tax was relinquished by the United States, it would be immediately substituted by a like tax, wherever it was important, for corporation and State purposes.

Mr. TALLMADGE spoke in support of his motion, and anticipating the contents of petitions on this subject which he expected would be laid before Congress at the present session, he took a view of the process by which, by the aid of vendue sales, foreign merchants deprived the Government of a part of its revenue, and superseded the fair merchant in the market, &c.

Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, opposed the motion. In some of the large importing cities, he admitted, the Government might, with much propriety, derive a revenue from this source, where the duty would have the operation attributed to it by Mr. TALLMADGE; and, if a discrimination could be made, he should be willing that in those commercial depots the tax might be suffered to remain. But, he said, in the smaller seaports, in the towns and villages, this duty was, almost without exception, levied on the necessitous and the poor, whom it was neither the policy, nor could it be the desire of the House to make liable to a tax, to the exclusion of others.

He believed, besides, that the cost of collection of the tax, if retained alone, would not fall short of the amount of the duty, if it did not exceed it.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, supported the motion on the same grounds as Mr. TALLMADGE, and stated extensively the operation of the system, under which the country was deluged with goods by the foreign dealers, with advantages in their favor, by the aid of the vendue system, which favored false invoices, against which no fair merchant could compete. He argued, besides, that in so far as the operation of this duty was to favor the fair merchant, and to embarrass the foreign merchant in his object of glutting our market with foreign supplies, it operated as an encouragement to our manufactures. As to the operation of this tax on the poor, the numerous exceptions from its operation, contained in the law, in a great degree obviated that objection.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, opposed the motion, also at some length. The object of the gentlemen from New York was very desirable, could it be obtained by retaining this duty. But that, he argued, was impossible. He admitted, to the extent his belief in the existence of extensive frauds on the revenue, against which he thought scarcely any provision would be sufficient to guard. A duty on sales at auction, to produce the desired effect, ought to be so high as to amount to a prohibition, discriminating, however, between the articles exposed for sale, and applying the duty particularly to dry goods. He did not know, he intimated, but he might go with the gentlemen in favor of some measure of this nature when fairly presented to the House. But he thought that question should be taken up on its own footing, and not be suffered to interfere with the repeal of the small unimportant existing duty, &c.

Mr. CLAY (the Speaker) also opposed the amendment; at the same time that he did not materially differ from the gentlemen from New York, in their views of the evils arising from the circumstances they had referred to. But he argued, and proceeded to show that some of those evils did not proceed from sales at auction, but from defects in our revenue laws, or in the administration of those laws; to which subject he earnestly invited the attention of the Committee of Ways and Means, as greatly to be deprecated. The system of sales at auction Mr. C. did not consider an evil of such magnitude as represented; but, fairly conducted, as a benefit to the community, as affording goods to interior merchants, &c. at a less cost of commission, profit, &c. than if brought from the shelves of the wholesale dealer. Mr. C. dwelt on the importance of protecting our manufactures, by correcting abuses of the revenue system. He believed the fair dealer had much cause to complain, and was happy in saying that he believed the frauds in the revenue to which he had referred were not attributable to the American merchant, but to the host of dealers cast on our shores by the present state of Europe, and invited here by the prospect of advantageous markets. The remedy was not to be found, he concluded by saying, in a duty of one per cent. on sales at auction; you must go deeper: it was in the entries at the custom-house, &c. that the evil must be sought and corrected.

Mr. TALLMADGE said he and his colleague had been entirely misunderstood if it was supposed that the simple retention of this duty was their sole object. Their intention, he said, was to pursue the subject in detail, the present motion being intended only to bring the matter before the House, with the hope of obtaining a decision favorable to their ultimate views. Although not objecting to an augmented duty on sales at auction, as suggested by Mr. SMITH, he thought it would be better to suffer the present duty to remain, and let the auctioneers go on in their usual course in preference to breaking in upon the system, and then reinstating it, &c.

Mr. LOWNDES spoke again in opposition to the motion, on the ground that the repeal should be total or none. If one exception were granted, the same reasoning would admit others till the object of the bill was defeated. Mr. L. replied to suggestions which had fallen from Mr. SMITH and Mr. CLAY. He was not persuaded that any decisive injury resulted from sales at auction; and if not productive of considerable convenience to the community, they would not be generally resorted to. He was not, therefore, in favor of putting a stop, by prohibitory duties, to a mode of traffic generally adopted, and convenient both to the buyer and seller. To the continuance of the present duty he was decidedly adverse, if for no other reason, for the great inconvenience which would attend the collection if retained.

Mr. STORRS stated the manner in which he thought the duty might be readily collected, through the agency of collectors of the ports, &c.

The question being taken on Mr. TALLMADGE's motion, it was decided in the negative by a large majority.

Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, moved to amend the bill by introducing a provision that if, during the late war, any distillers had received licenses from the Government which they were prevented from using by the events of the war, on proper representation to the Treasury of such cases, the duties paid should be refunded in proportion to the time lost.

Mr. LOWNDES suggested that this was a provision too general, and related to cases on which the House could decide individually with more propriety than in a general manner.

Mr. LITTLE declined withdrawing his motion, and stated the case of a gentleman in Baltimore during the late war, all whose workmen in his extensive distillery were withdrawn for military service, and not only their time; but the materials provided had been destroyed. He thought this a proper opportunity for providing for such cases generally.

Mr. L.'s motion was negatived.

The question was put on reporting the bill to the House—

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, expressed his desire of further time to reflect on this subject,

DECEMBER, 1817.

Repeal of Internal Duties.

H. OF R.

thus early called up. He was not satisfied, he said, from what he had seen, that the expenses of the Government could be paid without the aid of the internal taxes. It was very doubtful to him, from the slight view he had taken of the Treasury report, whether they could safely be repealed. He found, in that report no estimate was made for the additional expenditure for public buildings, and for several other objects. A bill was now before the House, he said, for commuting military bounty lands for money. The amount of expenditure this measure would involve, would be ten millions of dollars. There was in the estimates no provision for this contingency. In looking at the estimates he did not see from what source these moneys were to accrue, if voted. So important a bill as this, he thought, ought not to be hurried through the House. It had come by surprise on the members, who could not have had time fully to examine the details of the bill. For himself he was not disposed to act on the calculations of others, when he had time to make his own. He thought he saw weighty reasons why the bill should not pass as it stood; and he did not know that the public exigency required a bill of this kind to be hurried through without affording time, to the new members particularly, to examine how far the calculations of the revenue at the Treasury would agree with the fact; to compare the estimates with results, and see how former predictions on this head had been verified. For his part, Mr. B. said, he should be unwilling, on coming here at the next session, to pass a law for a loan to supply any deficiency in the revenue. Mr. B. concluded by moving to rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Mr. LOWNDES opposed the motion with great reluctance, because desirous to afford time to every one to reflect on public measures; but the reason why an early decision on this bill was urged, had been freely stated by the committee in their report, and he hoped would be satisfactory. It would be supposing very material errors in the Secretary of the Treasury, as well as in the Committee of Ways and Means, to presume, after the statements they had made, the probability of a deficiency in the revenue, when it was estimated that, in the year 1819, there would be a surplus of nine millions in the Treasury, after paying the liberal appropriation for the redemption of the public debt.

Mr. BALDWIN, referring to the Treasury report, said, that it appeared that the balance estimated to be in the Treasury in 1819, was stated to be applicable to the redemption of the Louisiana stock.

Mr. PIRKIN, of Connecticut, said, that from the examination which the Committee of Ways and Means (of which he is a member) had made of the subject, the House need be under no apprehension of any want of money. As to the Louisiana stock, the Government might or might not redeem it at the time specified, being bound only to redeem it in instalments of three millions annually; then to commence. The estimates of revenue heretofore made by the Treasury, Mr. P. said, had fallen much below the mark. They had last year calculated on twelve millions from imposts; the actual product had exceeded twenty. There was not the least apprehension of any deficiency of revenue. If there were, he might remind the House that, of the ten millions annually appropriated for the payment of the public debt, after the present year, and certainly after the payment of the Louisiana debt, five millions only can be applied to the payment of the public debt, except to the remnant of the old deferred stock. The remaining five millions must then either be idle in the Treasury until the year 1825, or be applied to the purchase of debt above par, if it cannot be got at par. It would be seen, therefore, that no difficulty could be apprehended from the want of revenue. Mr. P. added, if it were not important that this bill should pass within the present year, he would, with pleasure, consent to its postponement.

The question was then taken on Mr. BALDWIN's motion, and negatived.

The Committee rose and reported their agreement to the bill, without amendment.

On the question to engross the bill—

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, said he was not sufficiently acquainted with this subject to act conclusively on it, and he presumed others might be in the same situation. To give them time to examine, he moved to adjourn.

This motion was lost by a large majority; and the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow.

THURSDAY, December 11.

On motion of Mr. PARRIS, the Committee on Naval Affairs were instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering the rank and emoluments of surgeons in the Navy of the United States.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the establishment of land offices for the sale of the public lands in the Missouri Territory, at the following places: at the town of Arkansas, in the county of Arkansas; at the town of Jackson, in the county of Cape Girardeau; at the seat of justice, in the county of Lawrence; and at the seat of justice, in the county of Howard.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, Resolved, That the committee on so much of the President's Message as relates to roads, canals, and seminaries of learning, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for constructing a navigable canal to unite the waters of Lake Michigan with the waters of the Mississippi.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for constructing a navigable canal to unite the waters of Tennessee river with the waters of the Tombigbee.

Resolved, That the same committee be instructed to inquire into the expediency of provi-dging by law for improving the navigation of the Tennessee river.

On motion of Mr. SAMPSON, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road direct from the east parish of Bridgewater, through Halifax, Plympton, and Kingston, to Plymouth in Massachusetts.

On motion of Mr. HENDRICKS, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing William Samuel, of Harrison county, in the State of Indiana, on the pension list.

The same committee were also instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing James Andrew, of the county of Orange, and State of Indiana, on the pension list.

Mr. BASSETT submitted the following proposition of amendment to the standing rules and orders, which was read and laid on the table until to-morrow:

When any motion or proposition is made, the question, "Will the House now consider it?" shall not be put unless it is demanded by some member, or is deemed necessary by the Speaker.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the Committee of Accounts were instructed to inquire into the manner in which the contractor performs his engagement for printing and for stationery to this House, and report thereon.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the Secretary of War was directed to lay before this House the account of the sums awarded to the different claimants by the Commissioner under the act entitled "An act authorizing the payment for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes," passed the 9th of April, 1816, and the Act to amend the said act, passed the 3d of March, 1817, the species of property for which they were respectively awarded, distinguishing what sums have been paid, and the causes which delay or prevent the payment of the residue.

On motion of Mr. MARR, the Military Committee were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision for such officers and soldiers of the militia as have become disabled in consequence of diseases contracted while in the service of the United States, and for the widows and orphans of those officers and soldiers who, from like causes, have died since their return home.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what legal provisions are necessary to prescribe the effect which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of each State shall have in the courts of every other State. And that the same committee be also directed to inquire whether any, and if any, what further provisions by law are necessary to insure a more prompt publication of the Laws of the United States, and a more speedy and general distribution of them throughout the Union.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House a return of the present strength of the Army of the United States, with the distribution thereof among the several military posts which it is designed to protect, together with any information which he may be able to afford, respecting the competency of such force to preserve and defend the fortifications among which it is distributed, and to aid in constructing and to defend such other military works, if any, as it may be in the contemplation of the Government to erect for the more effectual security of the United States, and of the several Territories thereof.

On motion of Mr. COBB, a committee was appointed to inquire into the claims of certain detachments of the militia of Georgia for services performed in the defence of that State during the years 1793 and 1794, by order from the Executive of that State under a discretionary power communicated by the War Department, with leave to report by bill or otherwise. Messrs. COBB, ALEXANDER SMYTH, WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, TERRILL, MASON, BENNETT, and EARLE, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, the Committee of Ways and Means were directed to inquire whether any, and if any, what amendments are necessary to the act entitled "An act to regulate the duties on imports and tonnage."

The bill for continuing the Mint establishment at Philadelphia passed through a Committee of the Whole, having been called up by Mr. SEYBERT. The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading without opposition.

REPEAL OF INTERNAL DUTIES.

The engrossed bill for the abolition of the internal duties was read the third time.

Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, said he had no doubt of the passage of the bill; but, as the House was about to take leave of an old acquaintance, the internal taxes, which this bill proposes to repeal—on which he cheerfully congratulated his fellow citizens—he called for the yeas and nays on the passage of it.

The question having been stated "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, rose. To oppose a measure which had been recommended by the President, and would most probably be most joyfully received by a great majority of the people, he said, would be an effort so utterly hopeless of success, as almost to amount to an absurdity. He should not attempt it; but at the same time it seemed to him to be both an official and conscientious duty to express and act upon the opinion he really possessed upon every important question of legislation upon which he was called upon to vote. In the performance of this duty, he said, but without troubling the House with an unnecessary and useless discussion, I must give my voice against the total repeal and extinction of our system of internal taxation. I hold it to be unwise in any nation, particularly in a nation now mingling largely, and somewhat keenly, too, in the great national concerns of the world, and of course exposed to all the dangers resulting from such connexions, to deprive itself of the only sources of revenue which it can command and rely upon at all times and in all seasons, whether the political atmosphere be disturbed and shaken by the storms of war or reposes in the tranquillity of peace. We are not without a sad and calamitous experience on this subject; and have seen and felt how ruinous it is to wait until the enemy lines our coast and cuts off the possibility of receiving supplies to our Treasury from external sources, before we set about to organize a system for producing revenue from within. If the people are ever so willing to bear the burden when necessary, the time required to raise the revenue will be a period of embarrassment to the Government, of distress to the public credit, and disreputable loans, allowing a heavy discount to the lender. I would avoid such calamities by keeping up a reasonable and moderate system of internal taxation on objects properly selected and judiciously collected. I have no fondness for oppressing the people. Why should I have? I must expect to bear my share of the burden. But it is better to draw a moderate supply from them in the time of their prosperity than to come down upon them with a pinching oppression in the day of difficulty. The honorable chairman of the Committee of Ways and Means, with the discretion and reflection which belong to him, admits the proposed repeal is founded on our state of peace, and its probable continuance with all the world, and frankly declares that if our foreign relations were otherwise, he would oppose the repeal. Are we not, sir, trusting too much to this if? Yes, sir, if we could be assured of perpetual peace, we might do many excellent things, and avoid many evils. Do we not keep our army and navy because war may come? And should we not for the same reason keep up the means, and the only means, by which we can maintain this army and navy when their aid shall be required? We are to expend a million a year to augment the navy, and much more than this to support the army, both of which will be useless if we are never again to be troubled with war. Besides, sir, if I do not misjudge some indications already exhibited, we are about entering a path which, if pursued, may lead us to tread down the powerful hypothesis resting on this momentous if, and bring us again to the field of slaughter. If we really have too much money, (which, by the bye, is a story we heard once before,) why not remove the impost from salt; reduce the tonnage; reduce the duties on sugar, coffee, tea, and other articles, no longer luxuries, but necessities of life for the poor as well as the rich, why not expend the surplus in the internal improvement of our country, so loudly called for and so much required? I shall trouble the House no further on this subject than to say that, while I oppose the general destruction of all the internal taxes, there are some of them I would gladly dispense with.

DECEMBER, 1817.

Repeal of Internal Duties.

H. OF R.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, said, it appeared to him to be a singular thing, that whilst, only three years ago, Congress were legislating these taxes into existence, and paying a premium of thirty per cent. to the usurers for money, they should now be legislating on what was called a surplus revenue; not surplus in fact, but in anticipation. He knew, he said, that it was not permitted to him, and to other young members, to take time to give a due examination to the subject—he had requested it yesterday, and been refused, and he was therefore obliged to go into the subject without much consideration. Referring to the estimate of the Treasury, of the expenditures for the ensuing year, he found a variation between those for the present year and for the next, for which he could not account. The estimate for the Army, for instance, was two millions less this year than the last—on what data formed he did not know. Nothing had appeared which satisfied him that Congress could do justice to the country in taking off the taxes on estimates of this kind, when there was no certainty that they were correct. If we have this surplus revenue, why not, as had been justly remarked by his colleague, take off the taxes from the necessities of life? It had been said, that the imposts were collected at less expense than the internal revenue. But what was the comparative expense to the consumer? If he pays his money in taxes directly to the collector, he pays no more than that; but if he pays it on the increased price of the commodities he consumes, he pays heavy commissions likewise to the importer, the wholesale and retail dealer, through whose hands the articles pass. I do not know, said Mr. B., why we in the West, who are so much interested in this view of the question, should be permitted to pay our taxes directly to the Government, instead of paying the increased amount charged on foreign goods. The repeal of these taxes, he said, he believed to be fraught with consequences highly injurious to manufactures, as tending to produce objection to the imposition of any protecting duties on imported manufactures, which would be asked of Congress. He was sure, he said, that public opinion did not require the repeal of the internal duties; and, he believed, that those who should vote for this bill, under the impression that they ought to follow, and were following, public feeling, would find they were taking a wrong course. He believed that the repeal would be unpopular; that the people were no longer to be misled by names, and already saw that it was better to pay their taxes directly than indirectly to the Government. Mr. B. said, he was unwilling to trust to the assurance of the Committee of Ways and Means, that taxes would be again laid whenever necessary. When were these taxes laid, Mr. B. asked? Not until the third session after the war was declared; it was not until the Government was destitute of means, that the taxes were imposed—and before the proceeds of them flowed into the Treasury, the stock of the Government had been hawked about to any bidder, and the Government itself had become the prey of every shark usurer in the stock alleys of the nation. When the taxes should be again wanted they would be again delayed, till the nation was on the verge of bankruptcy. However those might think who recommended the measure, and those who were now precipitating it through the House, the public opinion, he was satisfied, was on the other side. He represented a part of the country which might be supposed to be interested, and the people there were opposed to the repeal, which he believed with them, to be hostile to the best interests of the West. Mr. B. said, he did not wish to enlarge on the subject—he knew it was useless; and if the gentlemen who were pressing forward the measure thought they were running the race of popularity, he should impede their progress but a few minutes. But he wished gentlemen to reflect a moment, whether the substantial interests of the country would not be seriously injured by the measure. It would appear to him, he said, before repealing these taxes, they ought to wait towards the close of the session, and see what expenditures Congress might authorize. Propositions for providing for the widows and orphans, of soldiers killed in battle, for erecting three additional military academies, for establishing a corps of invalids, &c., were before the House, and a bill had been already reported for commuting soldiers' lands for money, which, if passed, would of itself require ten million dollars. Whence is this money to come? In reply to the suggestion of a want of present objects to which to apply the surplus of revenue, Mr. B. said, that objects could not be wanting as long as the twenty-one millions of stock of the United States subscribed to the National Bank remained unredeemed. It appeared from the Treasury report, that during the present year only eighteen millions of stock had been redeemed altogether: among the particulars of information, the want of which he felt, Mr. B. said, he should like to know how much of this eighteen millions was that which had been subscribed to the bank, and what portion was of other stock. If ten or eleven millions of that stock were, as he presumed, yet redeemable, it would take away one strong argument for the repeal of the taxes, by affording an object to which to apply the surplus revenue. There were, Mr. B. concluded by saying, various considerations which pressed on his mind against the passage of this bill; but he wished not to take up the time of the House. He had briefly stated some of the reasons why he conceived the bill impolitic and of a ruinous tendency to the important interests of the country.

Mr. SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, next spoke to the question. In the threshold of his remarks, he disclaimed all intention to enter into the race for popularity, which had been spoken of. On a subject of this kind, there ought to be a belief that the members were all actuated by fair motives, particularly on a question where, it appeared to him, the weight of the argument was in favor of the repeal; and it was to endeavor to show, that, in voting to repeal the internal duties, the members of the House might act from reason, and not from a desire of popularity, that he rose. In the first place, with respect to the system of internal taxation, he said he was not apprized how the argument applied which recommended the continuance of a system; because the greater part of the system which had been established, the very bone of it, had been taken out, and there remained some half dozen of taxes which seemed to have been left, not as constituting a system certainly, but to guard against the possible chance of a deficiency in the revenue. Let gentlemen look at the taxes remaining, and see whether they did not present themselves in that view to them. Now, it appeared to him, Mr. S. said, instead of talking about maintaining a system, gentlemen should turn their attention to the taxes individually, and see whether there was any one of the taxes which, on the ground of its own merits, ought to be preserved. To at least four out of six of the taxes which remain, Mr. S. said he had, on general grounds, decided objections, and would prefer very much, if the revenue derived from them was necessary, that it should be collected from other objects. He instanced as a duty particularly objectionable, that on the refining of sugar—a valuable branch of domestic industry—which, at former periods, had been specially fostered and encouraged, by drawbacks, &c. This branch of manufactures was exceedingly oppressed by this tax, as was well known to many members who represented the towns where it was carried on. The tax on retailers of foreign articles was also extremely oppressive, falling without discrimination on every one who was honestly endeavoring by retailing to obtain a livelihood, and who was obliged to mix the smallest particle of foreign produce in his assortment: and we have seen the small dealers vanish under the operation of the tax. The duty on stamps too was objectionable, as operating only on a particular class of citizens, and that class the industrious and enterprising one. It operated not on the capitalist; not on the man who has money—for he has no occasion to go into bank for more—but on those who are benefitting the public by their activity and employment of borrowed capital. To the remaining taxes he had no particular objection, and if he saw any necessity for it, would be willing to continue them. But why continue them? To be prepared for war hereafter, and not overtaken by difficulty when it comes? If ever (said Mr. S.) there was a period in this country when there was a stronger possible appearance of a continuance of peace, he had no knowledge of it. He knew not from what quarter hostilities could be expected; and he was sure he saw no disposition in this House to involve the nation in war. Mr. S. said he would not recur to that period when these taxes were laid, nor say whether it was too soon or too late; but the argument which had been derived from that retrospect seemed to him to prove too much. For a man puts on his armor when he goes into battle, and when he comes out he puts it by. If you foster the interests of the citizen, by relieving him from burdens in those avocations which enrich him and the country, it is then you prepare the armor to be put on in war. Mr. S. said he had still another objection to retaining these taxes. He believed we could not long have a surplus in the Treasury. If we began with a large surplus, means would speedily be found of spending it, and that probably in projects not the most useful or advantageous to the community: and, if the taxes were retained, we should find ourselves soon without a surplus, and in the case of emergency instead of reinstating repealed taxes, would have to lay new taxes, in addition, to the same amount as those already existing. He would not inquire, he said, whether it was popular to keep the taxes on or take them off; but he held it to be the duty of this House to the people, when there was revenue enough to meet the public expenditure, not unnecessarily to continue the public burdens.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, said, the prayer of every Republic ought to be, give me neither poverty nor riches. A young Government, like a young man, was very apt to be ambitious; and when we have money, we have an opportunity of gratifying that ambition. Another objection to having more money than we want, was, that it created too many calls on the Treasury. We have already found out that we have a small surplus in the Treasury; and it has already generated a great many claims on it. He presumed that, before the end of the session, where there was one thousand dollars of surplus, there would be a million of demand. It would be rather a singular position to find the House of Representatives in, that they who hold the purse-strings of the nation should be urging money into the pocket of the Executive. We are told by the Executive, said Mr. H., that there is no need of these taxes; on that branch of the Government would fall the responsibility, if the Treasury should become as empty as some apprehended, and we should require money when we cannot obtain it. As regarded a system of internal taxation, Mr. H. said he hoped that he should never see, in this country, such a system established. He hoped internal taxation would only be resorted to when the exigencies of the country required it; and then, and then only, would the people endure it. It is odious to the people; so much so, in principle, that there was great objection, at the formation of our Constitution, to giving to the Congress the power to lay internal taxes. He said he believed that at this time, whether it was popular or unpopular to relieve the people from these taxes, it would be best for them to be repealed; as indeed he rather inclined to believe that the people themselves thought. He should be unwilling, for himself, to take any share of the responsibility of continuing a broken system, as it had been aptly described—an imperfect and unequal system of internal taxes. If the system were a perfect one; if it bore equally on all classes of citizens; if it were such a system as was both necessary and proper, there might be a reason for retaining it: but, having none of these qualities, he would put an end to this mutilated fabric of taxation. He was, he said, in favor of keeping up the Army as a military school; the Navy, too, he hoped would be always cherished, to defend our rights on the ocean, as it once has done. Both these objects should be well attended to; but, if we had already revenue enough for both, and for all other expenses of the Government, and for the rapid redemption of the public debt, without the aid of these taxes, why should they be retained? He was for giving an opportunity for our people to be prosperous, that, when their direct aid shall again be necessary, they may be in a condition and disposition to come forward and cheerfully contribute it. But, Mr. H. said, he apprehended the recurrence of no such state of things as we had lately seen. Our trials have passed: we have seen the worst evils of our day.

Mr. DARBOUR, of Virginia, said that, although he was satisfied this bill would pass, and although, when he came into the House to-day, he had nothing like an intention of uttering one word upon it, he thought it his duty to vindicate the principles which guided him in his vote on the bill before the House. He premised that, in giving his vote for this bill, he was in no degree influenced by a desire for popularity, except that be a desire for popular favor which prompts us to decide correctly, according to our impressions, when the interest of the nation is concerned. Passing from that remark, he came to the question whether, under existing circumstances, it be or be not good policy to retain the system proposed to be repealed. He begged leave to remark that, according to his idea of the theory of our Government, it was never expected by the framers of the Constitution that internal taxation was to be a permanent policy of our Government. Looking into the book from which we derive most of our ideas on the theory of our Government, and which might be regarded as a contemporaneous exposition of the Constitution, it appeared that taxes on exports were expected to be the principal source of revenue. This was not only the intention as he believed, of the framers of the Constitution, but it was most correct in principle, because most convenient to the people. He would not go into an examination of the relative merits of the two systems of internal and external taxation: it was sufficient to remark, on this head, that the one was compulsive, the other voluntary. In any event, the system of exterior taxation was to be continued; and, if it were abundantly productive for the necessities of the Government, what need to retain, also, the system of interior taxation? What, Mr. B. asked, are taxes? Contributions of the people to the maintenance of the Government when its wants are such as to require them. When it is demonstrated that any part of these taxes are not wanted, it is not only the duty of Government, but it is its soundest policy to repeal them. Are they, then, wanted? said Mr. B. Look at the exhibition of the state of our finances, and a bare glance affords an answer to the question. It appears that such is the state of our revenue, that we have within the past year redeemed eighteen millions of a public debt, the whole amount of which did not much exceed an aggregate of a hundred and twenty millions. It appeared, also, that, after the Yazoo stock and Louisiana debt were paid off, we should have, not only a sum equivalent to all the expenditures of the Government, but exceeding that amount by five millions annually, up to the year 1825, which is the first moment that the war loan of 1812 is redeemable, by the terms of the contract for it. Shall we undertake, then, to lay or to continue taxes, not because we do, but because we may, want the money? I shall not, said Mr. B., be among the number of those who refuse to lay taxes when the present necessities of the Government require it, or when it is probable that they will. But, he said, he held it to be bad policy to lay taxes when not wanted; not only because useless, but because the people could always make the best use of their own money, and to collect it into the Treasury would be to withdraw the means by which manufactures, agriculture, and commerce were fostered and the national wealth enlarged. And to withdraw it for what? To lie idle in the Treasury? It could not, Mr. B. said, be the object of gentlemen to take from the people money which was advantageously employed in their own occupations, and thereby enhancing the general prosperity, to become a mere caput mortuum in the Treasury of the United States, and thus lose the advantage of capital otherwise actively employed. The wealth of the people is the wealth of the Government, which is enriched by the prosperity of the people. It remained to be seen whether the Government could use the revenue arising from internal duties. Mr. B. proceeded to show that they could not. In 1819, he said, the Louisiana debt would be extinguished. What then should be done with the surplus revenue? Should it lie idle, or should the Government go into the market and purchase up the public stock? That stock was already above par; and was it not evident that every dollar purchased, at least until the time approached when it might be redeemed, would contribute to put it more above par? From Mr. B.'s examination of this point, he inferred the Government could not make use of the proceeds of these taxes, if they should be retained. He could not see the correctness of the reasoning, he said, which would lead the House to the conclusion that, because it was proper in peace to prepare for war, therefore money should be drawn from the pockets of the people which could not be used. He would keep up a small army; he would increase the navy, because it could not at once be called into being on occasion. But though a navy could not, a system of taxation might, and there was therefore the less occasion unnecessarily to draw money from the pockets of the people. If the Government did not redeem that part of its funded debt which constituted its portion of the capital of the Bank of the United States, the money accruing to the Treasury, without these taxes, could not be used; but, if that stock was to be redeemed, which was optional with the Government, still there would be money enough without these internal taxes for all the purposes of the Government. Was it not then wise policy to repeal the taxes? Was it not a wise policy to repeal them because the people looked for it? The internal duties were considered as war taxes, imposed for the occasion, and cheerfully paid; but would not be willingly borne when the necessity which called for them had ceased. In a time of peace, moreover, to keep up two systems, one of internal and one of external taxation, was extremely inconvenient; and when the system of internal taxation was reduced to its present extent, the expenses of collection bore too large a proportion to the amount, and put into the pockets of the collectors what would be much better in the pockets of the people. In short, every consideration, Mr. B. said, recapitulating those which he had adverted to; combined to bring his mind to the conclusion that this bill ought to pass. There is no nation in the world, he added, there never was a nation, whose sinking fund bore so large a proportion to its debt as this. Look at the English sinking fund; compared with ours it is scarcely dust in the balance. Mr. B. said he desired to see a large sinking fund; but there was a point beyond which that ought not to be increased; because its burden became, by the augmentation of our population, every year diffused over a greater surface, and with less pressure on each individual. Whilst he would not suffer the national debt to lie as an incubus on the nation, he would not discharge that debt by oppressing the people. Mr. B. concluded by saying that the internal taxes were now useless; worse than useless, as having the effect of rendering a large amount of the capital of the country 'unproductive; that they were unnecessary now, and unnecessary prospectively; because, whenever necessity demanded it, there was energy enough in the people to call into action the resources of the nation; and sufficient for the day was the evil thereof.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Virginia, said he had not intended to have opened his lips on this question, and should not have done so but for the remarks of the member from Pennsylvania, (Mr. BALDWIN.) He, it seemed, would not enter into the race of popularity. With due respect to the Chair, Mr. J. said, he had thought this remark ought to have received its animadversion—

The SPEAKER, interposing, said, that the remark had not escaped his attention, and would have been noticed by him, had he not presumed it to have been inadvertently made, and not intended to bear that construction which might be given to it.

Mr. BALDWIN rose in explanation. He had not intended, he said, to use the expression in an offensive sense; he had no design of that sort. He meant merely to say, if any gentleman were disposed to run the race of popularity, he would not join in it. If what he had said was liable to any harsher interpretation, he was sorry, as it was not his meaning.

Mr. JOHNSON resumed the floor. He said he did, at the last session of Congress, present to the House a statement founded on facts, by which he proved, from official documents, beyond the possibility of doubt, that for no legitimate object could those taxes be desirable; and had then also shown how oppressively they had acted on his constituents. The first gentleman up from Pennsylvania, (Mr. HOPKINSON,) seemed to anticipate a war, in telling the House that the nation was, he apprehended, about to tread in a perilous path; and that therefore these taxes ought to be retained to guard against a deficiency of revenue in such event. These poor two and a half millions, Mr. J. suggested, would go but a little way towards this object; but if wanted, they might be again imposed. How that gentleman acted (Mr. HOPKINSON) during the late war, Mr. J. said, he did not know; but, said he, I appeal to history, to the Journal of the House, to show how I acted. I never shall shrink from the duty of imposing taxes when the necessities of my country require it. I voted a tax of more than one-fourth of its product on the most extensive manufacture of my constituents. I voted to pledge the soil on which I live, in which rest the bones of my ancestors, to pay the war debt. But I am not disposed, nor will I consent to continue a tax which is unnecessary and injurious, when the necessities of the country do not require it. Mr. J. here referred to the Treasury estimate of last year, reasoning from it, that there was no fear of a deficiency of revenue for the future. In that report the Secretary furnished the following estimate of the amount which would be received from three successive years, from customs, viz:

For 1817 - - - -	$18,000,000
1819 - - - -	18,000,000

By the report of the present session, instead of $48,000,000, for the same period, $66,000,000 would be derived from this source. If on the former estimate, without a reduction of the Army, or diminution of any expense contemplated by existing laws, the internal taxes could have been dispensed with, as was clearly established, no doubt can now exist that they ought to be repealed. Patriotism requires that the people should be relieved from them. Could it then, be necessary, Mr. J. asked, to continue these taxes, so little productive, and so very inconvenient to the people, merely to guard against imaginary evils? He hoped the bill would pass.

Mr. HOPKINSON again spoke, principally in explanation, and in reply to his colleague, (Mr. SERGEANT.) His system, he concluded by saying, was now singular, and seemed to excite surprise. But it had not been singular at the last session, when the same proposition as that now pending was before this House, and was rejected. The war was then gone—it had been some time—and if there was any force in the idea of the pledge to repeal the taxes at the end of the war, he asked why they were not repealed at the last session, seeing so unanimous a determination to repeal them now? He should give his vote, with the most perfect respect for the motives and conduct of all from whom he differed in opinion on this occasion, against the bill.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, rose to correct an erroneous impression which appeared to exist on the mind of Mr. BALDWIN, respecting the amount of public debt paid in as part of the capital stock of the Bank of the United States; which amount, it being optional with the subscribers to pay either in stock or in gold and silver, Mr. P. showed, had, owing to the recent rise of stocks above par, been considerably less than by law it might have been. He understood, that of the debt thus subscribed, the Commissioners of the Sinking Fund had already paid every cent, not only the six, but the seven per cent. stock, all but their own seven millions, which bore but five per cent. interest, and might or might not be paid, at the pleasure of the Government. The taxes, therefore, were not wanted to redeem that stock. The same gentleman had also noticed various projects on the table of this House, which might occasion the expenditure of money. When that honorable gentleman had been longer in this House, Mr. P. said, he would know that there might be many projects offered, which would involve the expenditure of money, but which would never pass. But, was the House to legislate on the possibility of expenditures being authorized? Surely not. Some of these taxes, Mr. P. said, were not only inconvenient but oppressive; he instanced the dollar carriage tax, producing, small as it was, $70,000, and operating with extensive and vexatious inconvenience in particular small States. He regretted extremely that the gentleman from Pennsylvania had not more time to examine the facts respecting the revenue and estimates, to enable him to decide with more satisfaction to himself; but the peculiar situation of this bill forbade a delay, which he should otherwise be glad to afford to gentlemen desiring it. If the gentleman had examined the bill and the whole subject with that acuteness of which he knew him to be capable, he would not have supposed that gentlemen, in voting for the repeal, were running a race of popularity.

Mr. SMITH, of North Carolina, rose, since other gentlemen had adverted to the oppressiveness of particular taxes, to speak of a tax which operated grievously on the district which he represented—the tax on distillation. Who were the distillers, he asked, and particularly of whiskey? Were they the farmers who lived on the seaboard, and obtained great prices for their crops of grain; or were they the farmers of the back country, producing much grain, and at a great distance from market, and under the necessity of converting it into spirit, to get it in that shape to a market? It was the latter class, he said, who paid a considerable portion of that tax, which also heavily affected those who converted into spirit the produce of their orchards. The tax on distillation was, in fact, a tax on agriculture, almost as much as the direct tax. It was, besides, unequal, as he showed by various illustrations. He denied, also, in respect to this tax, the justness of the argument, that the consumer paid the tax; because, he said, the tax prevented the distiller from coming into competition with foreign liquors, and thus threw the burden of the tax on him. He thought the distiller had the same right to bring his complaint into this House, and to ask a respect for his interest, as the manufacturers of iron, sugar, or any other product. Relying himself on the report of the Secretary of the Treasury, and satisfied with the report of the Committee of Ways and Means; having also experienced the unequal and inconvenient operation of these taxes, he was determined to vote for the repeal of them.

The question on the passage of the bill was determined in the affirmative—yeas 161, nays 5—as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Vermont, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Barber of Ohio, Bassett, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bellinger, Bennett, Bloomfield, Blount, Boden, Boss, Burwell, Butler, Campbell, Clagett, Claiborne, Cobb, Colston, Comstock, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Cruger, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Desha, Drake, Earle, Edwards, Ellicott, Floyd, Folger, Forney, Forsyth, Gage, Garnett, Goodwyn, Hale, Hall of North Carolina, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herbert, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Hogg, Holmes of Massachusetts, Holmes of Connecticut, Hubbard, Hunter, Huntingdon, Ingham, Irving of New York, Johnson of Virginia, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lawyer, Lewis, Linn, Little, Livermore, Lowndes, McLane, W. NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Hopkinson, Middleton, Jer. Nelson, and Storrs—5.

So the bill was passed.

FRIDAY, December 12.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report of the Secretary of War of the number of warrants for military bounty lands, issued by virtue of acts passed for that purpose, to soldiers who served during the late war, with the quantity of land included in such warrants; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, containing in obedience to the 16th section of the act incorporating the Bank of the United States, his reasons for not transferring the deposits of the public moneys in certain places to the said bank or its branches; which letter was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Secretary of the Treasury on the petition of William Taylor and Ezekiel Walker; which was referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

The Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill authorizing the commutation of soldiers' bounty lands, were discharged from the consideration of the same; and it was committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed sundry resolutions moved by Mr. Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on the 9th instant.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill to establish an uniform system of bankruptcy throughout the United States; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, at the instance of the Committee of Elections, introduced the following resolution, under the impression that it proposed a course the most respectful to the House, if not the only manner in which the committee could execute the duty required of them:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to communicate to this House, whether any, and, if any, which of the Representatives named in the list hereto annexed, have held any office under the United States since the 4th day of March, in the year 1817; designating the office or offices they have respectively held, the time of appointment and acceptance of the said offices; whether the same are now held, and, if not, when the same were severally resigned.

[Annexed to the resolution was a list of the names of the members of the fifteenth Congress.]

The resolution was agreed to, and a committee appointed to present the same to the President.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Alexander Worster, of Massachusetts, lately an officer of the Army, who prays indemnification for damages recovered from him by the friends of a minor whom he had enlisted and detained as a soldier, under the belief that said minor was of full age.

On suggestion of Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, after some conversation, in which the principle of the report was controverted, the report was referred to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. PARRIS, of Massachusetts, from a select committee to whom was referred the petition of Noah Miller, Inspector of the Port of Penobscot, who prays for a pension in consequence of disability incurred by a wound received whilst in the execution of his duty, reported a bill for his relief; which was twice read, and committed.

DECEMBER, 1817.

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

Mr. SAVAGE, of New York, made a report from the Committee of Revisal and Unfinished Business.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD, of New Jersey, from the committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the surviving Revolutionary patriots, reported, in part, a bill concerning certain surviving officers and soldiers of the late Revolutionary army.

[This bill provides that every commissioned and non-commissioned officer or soldier, who had served in the Army during the war which terminated in the Treaty of Peace with Great Britain in 1783, and reduced to indigence, or by age, sickness, or any other cause, may be unable to procure subsistence by manual labor, shall receive half pay during life, equal to the half of the monthly pay allowed to his grade of service during the Revolutionary war—provided, that no pension thus allowed to a commissioned officer shall exceed the half pay of a lieutenant-colonel.]

The bill was twice read and committed.

The motion submitted by Mr. BASSETT, of Virginia, to amend the rules of the House, was taken up and agreed to. [The question of consideration, which has heretofore been a matter of much contention in the House, in the days of party conflict, is thus expunged from the rules of the House.]

On motion of Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire what further provisions are necessary in the existing laws, for the more effectual prevention of frauds by the purchasers of the public lands.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, the Committee on the Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making further provision by law for the final adjustment of land claims in the Missouri Territory.

On motion of Mr. MOORE, of Pennsylvania, the Committee on the Post Office were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing an extra compensation to the Postmaster at Beavertown, in Pennsylvania.

On motion of Mr. McLANE, of Delaware, the committee on so much of the Message of the President as relates to roads and canals, were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States to subscribe for stock in the company incorporated under the name and style of the Chesapeake and Delaware Canal Company, or any other company now, or hereafter to be, incorporated for similar purposes, to be paid by the appropriation of the public lands, or by any surplus money in the Treasury of the United States.

A report was received from the Department of State on the petitions of Antoine Bienvenue, Peter La Coste, and Jacques Villere; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

The engrossed bill, supplementary to the act for the establishment of the Mint (for continuing the same at Philadelphia) was read a third time, and passed.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the relief of John Bate.

This bill, which proposes to indemnify Mr. Bate for certain losses sustained by the overflow of a Saline rented by him from the Government, occasioned a debate of some length, involving the principle, as well as the facts, which lasted till the usual hour of adjournment, when the bill was postponed for further consideration.

The House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 15.

Two other members, to wit: from Pennsylvania, JOHN ROSS, and from Mississippi, GEORGE POINDEXTER, appeared, produced their credentials, were qualified, and took their seats.

Mr. SILSBEE presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of Essex county, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that the act imposing duties upon imported salt may be repealed; or that the act granting bounty to vessels employed in the fisheries may be so altered or modified as that the bounty on small vessels may be equal, per ton, to the bounty granted to large vessels.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. ROSS presented a petition of the cotton and woollen manufacturers residing in Providence and its vicinity, in the State of Rhode Island, praying that the duties at present imposed on imported cotton and woollen goods may be rendered permanent, and that provisions may be made more effectually to prevent evasions of the payment of said duties; and that such further measures may be adopted for the security and promotion of American manufactures as Congress may deem proper and expedient.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD presented a petition of sundry inhabitants of the counties of Burlington and Gloucester, in the State of New Jersey, praying that additional duties may be imposed on the various species of iron imported into the United States.

Mr. WENDOVER presented a petition of the merchants and traders in the city of New York, praying that a duty of not less than ten per centum may be imposed on sales at auction of foreign merchandise; and that additional provisions may be enacted to secure the payment thereof, as well as of the import duties, to prevent frauds, and to secure the petitioners and other honest and fair dealers a due participation of the benefits arising out of the foreign commerce of the United States.

Ordered, That the said petitions be referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, presented a letter addressed to him as chairman of the Committee on the Public Lands, respecting islands in the various rivers flowing through the public lands; which letter was referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. PINDALL, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing more effectually by law for reclaiming servants and slaves escaping from one State into another; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Mr. PINDALL, Mr. BEECHER, and Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. ALLEN, of Vermont, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the payment to the present holder of the amount of a loan-office certificate, No. 9948, signed by Samuel Hillegas, and countersigned by J. Lawrence, and bearing date January 10, 1780; which certificate has never been paid.

On motion of Mr. BARBER, of Ohio, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road from Marietta to Lancaster, by the route through Oliver's settlement, on the head waters of Wolf Creek, and a road from Warren, by Parkman and Burton, to Painesville.

The unfinished business of last sitting (the bill for the relief of John Bate) being called over—

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said the bill involved not only equitable and judicial inquiries, but also a variety of facts to be established on testimony exhibited to the House. And as such an inquiry interfered with business peculiarly legislative, he thought it had better be referred for an investigation to a different tribunal; and, having confidence in the abilities and just disposition of the head of the department most proper for the investigation, he moved that the case be referred to the Secretary of the Treasury, to report thereon.—Agreed to.

Mr. LOWNDES, of South Carolina, made a report on the petition of John McConnel and Luke Hoff, praying a remission of duties on licenses for distilling, the one on account of sickness of the party obtaining the license, the other on account of the dryness of the season, which rendered the business unprofitable. The report, which was adverse to the prayer of the petitioners, was concurred in, nem con.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made a report on the petition of Daniel Evans, unfavorable thereto; which was read and concurred in, but afterwards reconsidered, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. RHEA, from the same committee, made a report unfavorable to the petition of Richard S. Morris, who prays for reimbursement of a lost certificate for Revolutionary services or supplies. This report was opposed by Mr. BASSETT of Virginia, and Mr. LIVERMORE of New Hampshire, to whom Mr. RHEA replied.

On motion of Mr. FORSYTH, the report was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the committee to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State on the petition of Winslow and Henry Lewis, who pray indemnification for certain losses sustained by the application, to other purposes than their use, of certain moneys deposited in the Chancery of the United States

Consulate at Tunis, reported a bill for the relief of Winslow and Henry Lewis; which bill was twice read, and committed.

On motion of Mr. COMSTOCK, of New York, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the claim of Sylvanus Townsend for reimbursement of two old loan office certificates.

AMELIA ISLAND AND GALVESTON.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th of this month, I transmit, for the information of the House, a report from the Secretary of State, with the documents referred to in it, containing all the information of the Executive, which it is proper to disclose, relative to certain persons who lately took possession of Amelia Island and Galveston.

JAMES MONROE.

WASHINGTON, December 15, 1817.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,

December 13, 1817.

The Secretary of State, to whom has been referred the resolution of the House of Representatives of the 8th instant, requesting the President to lay before the House any information he may possess and think proper to communicate, relative to the proceedings of certain persons who took possession of Amelia Island, at the mouth of St. Mary's river, in the Summer of the present year, and made an establishment there; and, relative to a similar establishment previously made at Galveston, has the honor to submit to the President the accompanying papers containing the information received at the respective Departments of State, the Treasury, and the Navy, upon the subjects embraced in the resolution.

The above documents and accompanying papers were ordered to be printed.

EXPATRIATION.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, offered the following resolution to the House:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the exercise of the right of expatriation; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. ROBERTSON said that, for a very considerable length of time, he had wished this question to be decided by that tribunal to whom the decision of it belonged. He had, some years ago, offered a resolution similar to this, which was then not adopted; whether on account of the war in which we were then engaged, or for what other considerations, he had never been able to decide. The question which had arisen during the late war made a decision of it necessary. It would be well recollected, that among the soldiers of the United States were many individuals, natives of Great Britain, who were taken prisoners of war, and, according to the doctrine of the British Government, an odious doctrine, reprobated, he believed, by every other Government, were treated as traitors fighting against their Government; and that, if this construction had been consummated, our Government had menaced severe retaliation. But, with what consistency could the United States take the ground of retaliation, when they themselves had never recognised, in regard to our own citizens, what we demanded of Great Britain in regard to hers? So far as proceedings have been had on this point, Mr. R. said he was led to believe this right had been denied to our citizens. He would not dwell on the particulars of the decision on this subject by Judge Ellsworth some years ago, but merely state that Isaac Williams, a citizen of the United States, became a citizen of the French Republic, and was thereafter fined and imprisoned, by the decision of our courts, for making war on Great Britain, on the ground that he could not divest himself of the allegiance he owed to the United States. It was certainly proper, he said, that there should be some decision of the Legislature on a question of this nature and magnitude, which, at present, depended on the opinions of the Judiciary; and, as far as acts of Congress can regulate the judicial opinions, that such directions should be given on this head as he thought were obviously just and necessary. He had thought proper to make these remarks, because, although he believed the right to be clear, and that the Government would maintain it, as they ought to do, if they possessed the respect which is professed for the principles of liberty and for civil rights—a decision of the Legislature on the subject was more important at this moment, from considerations growing out of the present relations between the United States and foreign nations. By the existing treaty with Spain, a citizen of the United States, holding a commission under any Government at war with Spain, while we are at peace with her, is considered as a pirate. This extraordinary provision of the treaty must have escaped the attention of that power in our Government which makes treaties, or it would have been rejected, as well for its cruelty as because it is an act of legislation to define and punish piracies, and not a power confided to the treaty-making authority. To say nothing more of that, however, Mr. R. observed, that he deemed it necessary to protect the citizens of the United States from punishment, due only to piracy, when found with commissions in their hands from any Government at war with Spain. He wished to see our citizens at perfect liberty to become citizens of what nation they chose, on such terms as that nation should prescribe. It would appear, from what he had said, Mr. R. remarked, that there was not that neutrality in our conduct towards the two parties, in the war between Spain and her colonies, which we all profess. In this respect, the parties were certainly not on the same footing; since a citizen of the United States in the employ of Spain against the colonies is not considered as a pirate, but engaged in the service of the colonies against Spain, he is. He did not know that this fact would have induced him to have brought the question before the House, but for the deep impression he felt of the justice and propriety of adopting the principle, abstracted from the existing state of things. But it was the more necessary to reduce the principle to legislation, because of the situation in which the want of it has placed us in regard to foreign nations.

The motion of Mr. ROBERTSON was adopted without opposition, and without a division; and Messrs. ROBERTSON of Louisiana, MASON of Massachusetts, POINDEXTER, ROSS, and FLOYD, were appointed the committee.

PENSIONS TO SUFFERERS IN WAR.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Military Affairs be, and they are hereby, instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the pensions which now are or have been heretofore allowed to the widows and orphans of the officers and soldiers who were killed or who died in the service of the late war, for a term of five years beyond the periods at which they shall respectively cease under the existing laws.

Mr. H. said, that, as the resolution only contemplated an inquiry, he would detain the House but a few minutes only, with the motives which induced him at this time to bring it forward. Some of the pensions which had been granted, said he, have already expired, and others will expire, probably, before the session of Congress closes. Amongst the latter is that which was granted to the widow and orphan of the late Brigadier General Pike. In descending the Ohio river, said Mr. H., the eye of the inquisitive stranger is attracted by the humble dwelling which shelters the widow and orphan of that distinguished hero. Should his curiosity carry him further, and he should be induced to visit the abode of this interesting family, he would find, however humble the exterior, that neatness, frugal hospitality, and comfort, were to be found within its walls—that the lady had expended a proper portion of her pension in the pious purpose of educating her daughter. But, said Mr. H., if the visit should be repeated at the end of a year, and the law which the resolution contemplated should not pass, it would be found that the comforts of which he had spoken had fled, or that the means of procuring them were obtained by the personal exertions of the lady herself. From my knowledge of her situation, said Mr. H., I can state, with confidence, that her dependence for a comfortable support rests upon the generosity—no, sir, not on the generosity, but on the justice of this nation; for, can there be, under Heaven, a juster claim than that which is presented by a widow, under such circumstances? In fighting your battles she has lost a husband—he has bled that his country might be great, might be free, might be happy. But our advantage has been to her an insuperable misfortune. It has thrown her upon the justice and the honor of the nation. Let me not be told, said Mr. H., that the Government has performed its contract by giving the five years' pension which was provided at the commencement of the war. Sir, the contract was all on one side, and it would have been immaterial what had been its provisions. 'The noble spirits of Allen, of Hart, and of Pike, would have met your enemy with as much zeal and devotedness as if the provision for their families had been such as they would have dictated; no personal consideration would have withheld them from the field of glory. But, said Mr. H., there are moments when the claims of nature will have their full effect. I have seen, said he, the wounded and expiring warrior in that awful moment, when the martial ardor which had filled his bosom had been suspended by the pain which he felt—when the sacrifice being made, naught of public duty remained to be performed—then it is, sir, that the thoughts of his family would fill him with the greatest solicitude. A beloved wife and children left friendless and unprotected—the latter without the means of education, and both without support. In such a situation, said Mr. H., I have heard amidst the fervent aspirations to Heaven for their happiness, a consoling hope expressed that his country would not forsake them. Shall we, sir, not realize that hope? The country, said Mr. H., may be engaged in another war; if it should be the case, let us commence it with the benedictions of the widow and the orphan upon our heads. Let not their prayers ascend to Heaven charged with accusations against your justice and humanity. But, said Mr. H., I am anticipating a thing that cannot happen; the resolution will pass, as will a law that will be reported in obedience to it.

The motion of Mr. HARRISON was not opposed, and was adopted.

INTERNAL IMPROVEMENTS.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, from the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to roads, canals, and seminaries of learning, made a report in part, which was read, and committed to a Committee of the Whole House on Friday next. The report is as follows:

The committee, to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to roads, canals, and seminaries of learning, respectfully report, in part, that they have taken into consideration the subject referred to them, and bestowed on it that attention to which, by its importance, it is so eminently entitled. Involving, as it is supposed, a great Constitutional question on the one hand, and intimately connected, on the other, with the improvement, the prosperity, the union, and the happiness of the United States, it presents the fairest claims to candid and diligent investigation. Nor is it without additional interest from the division of opinion to which it has heretofore given rise between the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government; a difference which, in the indulgence of the rights of free opinion, will be still found to exist between the sentiments promulgated in the Message of the President, and those which will be advanced by your committee in this report; nor do they conceive that the expression in the Message of the President, of an opinion unfavorable to the Constitutional powers of the General Government, should be permitted to have any influence on the disposition of Congress to legislate on this interesting subject. For, if the Constitutional majority of the two Houses should differ with the Executive Department, the opinion of the latter, however respectable, must yield to such an expression of their will. On the other hand, if from deference to an opinion promulgated in an Executive communication, Congress should refrain from entering upon the consideration of a question involving Constitutional doctrine, it might happen that the opinion of the President would prevent the enactment of a law, even though there should be the Constitutional majority of two-thirds of both Houses in its favor. Thus, by the introduction of such a practice, the Presidential veto would acquire a force unknown to the Constitution, and the legislative body would be shorn of its powers from a want of confidence in its strength, or from indisposition to exert it. Whilst your committee are perfectly aware that nothing like this is contemplated by the Executive branch of the Government, they presume the House of Representatives will scrupulously avoid a course which may be construed into a dereliction of their privileges. They deem it, therefore, not improper to offer some considerations upon the question of the Constitutional powers of the General Government to pass laws for the improvement and construction of roads and canals, with the consent of the States.

As it is obvious, however, that these several subjects of legislation do not rest upon the same foundations, and that one of these may be within the sphere of the Constitutional powers of Congress, whilst the others may belong exclusively to the States, it is proposed to treat them separately; and the subject of the improvement and construction of public roads, which appears to your committee most clearly to be deducible to the powers vested in the General Government, will be first taken into consideration.

An accurate attention to the real points of difference on this subject, will greatly contribute to free the controversy from unimportant and irrelevant considerations. To attain this, we have only to compare what is manifestly admitted on the one hand, with what is claimed and contended for on the other.

The laws of antecedent Congresses, approved by successive Executive Magistrates themselves, will be resorted to, as affording evidence of what may be regarded as conceded to be within the powers of the General Government. The commendable jealousy which they have manifested of all encroachments of State power, and their scrupulous adherence to the most rigid principles of construction, in the interpretation of the Constitution, affords a suo guarantee that more has not been admitted than may fairly be assumed within the provisions of that instrument. Taking, then, the acts of both the Executive and Legislative branches of the Government for our guide, we shall find it clearly admitted that there are some cases, at least, in which the General Government possesses the Constitutional privilege of constructing and improving roads through the several States.

Thus, by the act of the 29th of March, 1806, confirmed, amended, and enlarged, by subsequent acts, a road was directed to be laid out and constructed from Cumberland, in the State of Maryland, to the State of Ohio, upon obtaining the consent of the States through which it should pass. The fund provided for this noble undertaking, was to consist of the proceeds of the sales of certain lands, the property of the United States, in the State of Ohio; so that this act furnishes the double admission, that "roads may be laid out by Congress through the several States, with their consent;" and that the expenses of constructing such roads may Constitutionally be defrayed out of the funds of the United States. The act was approved by the President, in office, in 1806, and other acts confirming, amending, and enlarging it, were passed by subsequent Legislatures, in the years 1810, 1811, and 1815, and approved by the President, in office, at those periods; nay, more, the three last acts contained appropriations to the amount of $210,000, payable out of any moneys in the Treasury, but reimbursable out of the Ohio fund; a fund which might or might not prove adequate, and which, in point of fact, is believed hitherto to have been insufficient.

Similar to this act in some of its provisions, and analogous in principle, are the acts of April 21st, 1806, and of the 3d of March, 1817, authorizing roads to be opened from Nashville and Reynoldsburg, in the State of Tennessee, to different points in the Mississippi Territory. But these acts go still further than the former, in omitting to require the previous consent of the State of Tennessee, through whose territories a part of the roads was to pass, and in directing the expenses of making them to be defrayed out of the public Treasury of the United States, without providing for its reimbursement in any manner whatsoever.

But lest the influence to be derived from these admissions should be deemed to be weakened by the consideration, that the collision of opinion on the Constitutional question has arisen since the passage of those laws, your committee will beg leave to refer to the date of the last act abovementioned, and to certain transactions of a date subsequent to the important and well remembered difference of opinion between the Executive and the Legislature at the last session of Congress. Since that period, they have satisfactory information that a road has been directed by the Executive of the United States to be improved, at the expense of the General Government, and doubtless for military purposes. This road is laid out from Plattsburg, or its vicinity, in the State of New York, to Sackett's Harbor, in the same State.

It is presumed that it is to be constructed at the expense of the General Government, and it is understood that the previous assent of the State has not been procured. From this act, therefore, of the Executive branch of the Government, emanating from that source at a late date, it would seem fair to infer, that the Constitution is admitted to have conferred upon the General Government a power, in some cases, to make roads, and to defray the expense of their construction out of the funds of the United States. And as the power is not denied in all cases, your committee will attempt to show that Congress has the power—

1. To lay out, improve, and construct, post roads through the several States, with the assent of the respective States. And,

2. To open, construct, and improve, military roads through the several States, with the assent of the respective States.

3. To cut canals through the several States, with their assent, for promoting and giving security to internal commerce, and for the more safe and economical transportation of military stores &c., in time of war; leaving, in all these cases, the jurisdictional right over the soil in the respective States.

In examining the soundness of these positions, your committee will not find it necessary to resort to what is called a liberal construction of the Constitution. They might, indeed, contend that as the powers here attributed to the United States are not in derogation of State rights, (since they can only be exercised by their assent) there is less reason for adhering to extreme rigor of construction. Where the authority claimed by the General Government is oppressive in its character, or dangerous in its tendencies; where it is asserted without deference to State assent, and in derogation of State power; where it is calculated to aggrandize the Union, and to depress its members, there may be some reason for holding the representatives of the nation to the "letter of their authority."

But where the power sought to be exercised is beneficial in its effects, and only felt in the blessing it confers; where it is not proposed to act, except with the assent of the party which is to be affected; where the measure is more calculated to increase the opulence and the power of the State, than to aggrandize the Union at its expense, it might fairly be contended that a less rigorous construction of the Constitution would be justifiable. It is neither unprecedented nor improper to construe the same instrument, liberally, where the interests of the contracting parties will be thereby promoted, and to adhere to a greater strictness where injury may arise to either by an interpretation too latitudinous. That the powers in question are neither dangerous in their tendencies, nor calculated to prove injurious to the States, would seem fairly inferable from the recommendation to amend the Constitution, and from the importance so justly attached to these objects on all hands.

But your committee, nevertheless, do not conceive it necessary to call to their aid the liberal principles of construction which the occasion might justify. They disavow any use of the general phrase in the Constitution to provide for the common defence and general welfare, as applicable to the enumeration of powers, or as extending the power of Congress beyond the specified powers; and they admit that to support their positions, it must appear that the powers contended for are expressly granted, or that they are both "necessary and proper" for carrying into execution some other express power.

That Congress, with the assent of the States respectively, may construct and improve their post roads, under the power "to establish post offices and post roads," seems to be manifest, both from the nature of things and from analogous constructions of the Constitution. It has been contended, indeed, that the word establish, in this clause of the instrument, comprehends nothing more than a mere designation of post roads. But if this be true, the important powers conferred on the General Government, in relation to the Post Office, might be rendered in a great measure inefficient and impracticable. In some States a power is vested in the inferior tribunals or county courts, to discontinue roads at their discretion; a post road designated by Congress might thus be discontinued, to the great embarrassment of the Post Office establishment. If the power to establish confers only the authority to designate, Congress can have no right either to keep a ferry over a deep and rapid river, for the transportation of the mails, or to compel the owners of a ferry to perform that service; and yet our laws contain an act, acquiesced in for more than twenty years, imposing penalties on ferrymen for detaining the mail and on other persons for retarding or obstructing its passage. It would be difficult to discover how this power of imposing penalties can be supported, either as an original or accessory power except upon principles of more liberal construction than those now advanced. There are, therefore, not a few who believe that, under the authority to "establish" post roads, Congress have express power to lay out, construct, and improve roads for the transportation of the mails.

But, however this may be, the authority which is conferred by the Constitution to make all laws which shall be "necessary and proper" for carrying into execution the enumerated powers, is believed to vest in the General Government all the means, which are essential to the complete enjoyment of the privilege of "establishing post offices and post roads." Even without this clause of the Constitution the same principle would have applied to its construction; since, according to common understanding, the grant of a power implies a grant of whatever is necessary to its enjoyment.

Taking these principles for our guide, it may be asked, if, under the narrow rules of construction contended for, the right of transporting the mails would not be held entirely at the will of the States respectively; on the other hand, if the United States have the privilege of establishing post roads, and are under the corresponding obligation of transporting the mails, is it not essential to the performance of this duty and to the enjoyment of this power, that they should have the right (with the assent of the respective States) to throw bridges over deep and rapid streams, to remove embarrassing and dangerous obstructions in the roads which they have the privilege of using, to level mountains which impede the velocity of transportation, and to render passable the morasses which intersect the roads through various parts of the Union? Can it be supposed, that the Convention, in conferring the power and imposing the duty of transporting the mails, (in its nature a matter of national concern,) intended to vest in Congress the mere authority to designate the roads over which it should be carried? Can it be denied, that the right to render a road passable is "necessary" to the enjoyment of the privilege of transporting the mails; or can it be denied that such improvement, with the assent of the States, is proper? And, if "necessary and proper," is it not justified as an incidental power?

It is indeed from the operation of these words, "necessary and proper," in the clause of the Constitution, which grants accessory powers, that the "assent of the respective States" is conceived to be a pre-requisite to the improvement even of post roads. For, however "necessary" such improvement might be, it might be questioned how far an interference with the State jurisdiction over its soil, against its will, might be "proper." Nor is this instance of an imperfect right in the General Government without an analogy in the Constitution; the power of exercising jurisdiction over forts, magazines, arsenals, and dock yards, depending upon previous purchase by the United States, with the consent of the State.

Admitting, then, that the Constitution confers only a right of way, and that the rights of soil and jurisdiction remain exclusively with the States respectively, yet there seems no sound objection to the improvement of roads with their assent. For if, by the 10th amendment, this right is reserved to the States, it is within the power of the State to grant it, unless the United States are incapable of receiving such a privilege. But by various acts of the Government, whose validity has never been questioned, it appears to possess not merely the power of receiving so unimportant a privilege as this, but of acquiring territory ad libitum. The acquisition of Louisiana, one of the happiest events of our political history, evinces the power of this Government to acquire territory by treaty from foreign nations. The cession of the Northwest Territory by Virginia shows that, under the strict principles of the old Confederation, which had so few features of nationality, the United States were deemed to have the power of acquiring lands even from the States of the Confederacy. The Georgia cession, completed about the year 1802, is finally decisive of the practical and undisputed exercise of a power in the General Government to receive a cession of territory from any member in the Confederacy, under the present Constitution. But if the General Government have the power to aggrandize itself by the acquisition of Territories, can the inferior privilege be denied them of receiving from a State the right of making or repairing the roads over which they are compelled to transport the mails through the Union?

Moreover, it seems to be admitted that the United States have, since the Georgia cession, a Constitutional right to make and repair roads in the ceded territory. If, then, by the transfer of the territory, Georgia could give, and the United States receive, the right to make roads within it, it is difficult to imagine a substantial objection to the validity of a grant to make a road, without a transfer of the territory.

2. Your committee conceive that the General Government has the power of making and opening military roads with the assent of the respective States, with a view to the common defence of the nation.

The power of opening a road during actual hostilities, for the purpose of transporting military stores, and marching troops to points that are menaced, has never yet been called in question. In truth, without such a power, the United States must fall a prey to foreign enemies; so that it seems fair to assume, that, whenever a military road becomes necessary for the national safety, it is in the power of the General Government to construct it. Of this necessity, that Government can be the only judge; and if the power of judging of this necessity be in them, the Constitutional power to act must of course be conceded. In the exercise of this discretion, a very general sentiment at present prevails in favor of preparations during peace for a state of war. And if the power of judging when it is necessary be admitted, the Constitutional right to do it at any time must be allowed.

It is not proposed to enter upon the delicate inquiry whether this right can be exercised by the General Government without the assent of the respective States through whose territories a road is constructed in time of peace, with a view to military operations in any future wars. Leaving this question for discussion whenever the occasion may call it forth, your committee are content, in this report, to assert the right to exercise this "necessary" power with the assent of the States.

Having taken this cursory view of the principles of the Constitution, in relation to the construction of roads by the United States, it may not be unimportant to examine what has been the practice under its provisions. The laws of the Union and the acts of the Executive branch of the Government, though they cannot be relied on to support acknowledged error, may safely be referred to in aid of our inquiries as to the proper construction of the Constitution.

Among the most conspicuous of the analogies affording by the acts of Congress, is the establishment of the Cumberland road already mentioned. This road has been constructed under the authority of the United States, with their funds, and through several of the States, with their assent. It has received the sanction of several distinct representative bodies, and of two Presidents of the United States. In short, if precedent alone were wanting, this act would furnish it.

Passing over the road from Nashville to Natchez, and the road from Reynoldsburg to a part of the late Territory of Mississippi, directed by an act of the last session of Congress, both of which afford precedents no less strong, we come to the military road lately directed by the Executive authority to be constructed, from Plattsburg or its vicinity, to Sackett's Harbor. This road is not to be constructed with any express assent of the State through which it passes, nor by the authority of Congress, but the President has deemed it necessary as a military road, and has ordered it to be made accordingly; a measure, the advantages of which are understood to be so palpable, as to have given great satisfaction in the country where the road is made. Hence, however, the question results, whether the exercise of this power by the President is not an express admission of the right of the General Government to open military roads even in time of profound peace, when they are believed to be necessary; and, if the power of judging of this necessity is possessed by the Executive, it cannot, it is presumed, be denied to the yet more important organ of the nation's will—the Legislature of the Union.

3. As to canals. It will not be necessary to recapitulate the arguments already used on the subject of roads, some of which will be found strongly applicable to canals. It may suffice to add, that the power to make canals and roads, for the promotion and safety of internal commerce between the several States, may justly be considered as not less incidental to the regulation of internal commerce than many of the powers exercised under the authority to regulate foreign commerce are accessory to that power. The embarrassments of the nation during war, from the want of good roads and canals, both in relation to trade and the transportation of cannon and military stores, have been too recently and sensibly felt to be forgotten. Vested with the power of making war, the Constitution could never have intended the General Government should make it under such disadvantages. If there be any part of that instrument which demands a liberal construction, it is that which confers on the Federal Government the power of making war, and the duty of protecting the Union from foreign hostility. With a Navy yet insufficient to insure the safe conveyance, coastwise, of troops, of implements of war, and military stores, and destined to contend with an enemy whose command of the sea enables them to assail, in rapid succession, the most distant positions, we have been compelled, from the want of an internal water communication, to encounter the most wasteful extravagance in the transportation of the means of defence. From the same cause, the internal trade between the States has been, during war, trammelled and embarrassed, and even cut off; and the productions of one portion of the community have rotted on their hands, while distant parts of the United States were suffering for the want of them.

It is true that the wants of the Union cannot confer power under the Constitution; but they may justly be touched upon as affording aid in its construction. They must have been clearly foreseen, and must have been supposed to be provided for. If the power to carry on war implies "the necessary and proper" means of conducting it to a safe and proper issue, and if, without the use of these means, the burdens, and the privations, and the miseries of war, are to be indefinitely increased, and its issue (always doubtful) rendered yet more precarious and unprosperous, are we not justified in presuming these means to have been contemplated as being vested in the General Government? Are we not justified in asserting this "necessary" power—the power of constructing roads and canals—at least with the assent of the States?

If your committee have not erred in attributing to Congress a Constitutional power to make roads and canals, either as an original or accessory power, it would seem that no doubt could remain of the right of applying our revenues to those purposes. If, indeed, the power was denied to the General Government of constructing roads and canals themselves, a question might still arise, whether it had not power to appropriate part of the revenue "to aid in the construction of roads and canals by the States."

There is perhaps no part of the Constitution more unlimited than that which relates to the application of the revenues which are to be raised under its authority. The power is given "to lay and collect taxes to pay the debts and provide for the common defence and general welfare of the United States;" and though it be readily admitted, that, as this clause is only intended to designate the objects for which revenue is to be raised, it cannot be construed to extend the specified powers of Congress, yet it would be difficult to reconcile either the generality of the expression or the course of administration under it, with the idea that Congress has not a discretionary power over its expenditures, limited by their application "to the common defence and general welfare."

A few of the very great variety of instances, in which the revenues of the United States have been applied to objects not falling within the specified powers of Congress, or those which may be regarded as incidental to them, will best illustrate this remark.

Thus, it can scarcely be conceived, that, if construed with rigor, the Constitution has conferred the power to purchase a Library, either specifically or as a "necessary" incident to legislation. Still less, perhaps, can the pious services of a Chaplain, or the purchase of expensive paintings for ornamenting the Hall of session, or various other expenditures of similar character, be considered as "necessary" incidents to the power of making laws. Yet, to these and to similar objects have the funds of the United States been freely applied, at every successive session of Congress, without a question as to the constitutionality of the application.

It would be yet more difficult to reduce, under the specific or accessory powers of Congress, the liberal donation to the wretched sufferers of Venezuela, or the employment of our revenues in the useful and interesting enterprise to the Pacific.

The bounties allowed for the encouragement of the fisheries form another expenditure that does not fall under any of the powers granted by the Constitution; nor could it fairly be considered as inferrible from the powers granted, upon the strict principles sometimes contended for. The same objections would apply to actual bounties paid to manufacturers for their encouragement, and to the indirect encouragement given to them, and which operates as a bounty to one class of the community and as a tax upon the rest. These and a variety of other appropriations can only be justified upon the principle that the general clause in question has vested in Congress a discretionary power to use for the "general welfare" the funds which they are authorized to raise.

Nor is there any danger that such a power will be abused, while the vigor of representative responsibility remains unimpaired. It is on this principle that the framers of the Constitution mainly relied for the protection of the public purse. It was a safe reliance. It was manifest that there was no other subject on which representative responsibility would be so great. On the other hand, while this principle was calculated to prevent abuses in the appropriations of public money, it was equally necessary to give an extensive discretion to the legislative body in the disposition of the revenues; since no human foresight could discern, nor human industry enumerate, the infinite variety of purposes to which the public money might advantageously and legitimately be applied. The attempt would have been to legislate, not to frame a Constitution; to force and provide specifically for the wants of future generations, not to frame a rule of conduct for the legislative body. Hence proceeds the use of this general phrase in relation to the purposes to which the revenues may be applied, while the framers of the instrument, in the clause which concludes the enumeration of powers, scrupulously avoid the use of so comprehensive an expression, and confine themselves to the grant of such incidental power as might be both "necessary and proper" to the exercise of the specified powers.

Nor is it conceived that this construction of the Constitution is calculated to give that unlimited extent to the powers of the Federal Government which by some seems to have been apprehended. There is a distinction between the power to appropriate money for a purpose, and the power to do the act for which it is appropriated; and if so, the power to appropriate money "for the general welfare" does not by fair construction extend the specified or incidental powers of Government. Thus, in the case under consideration, if the power to make a road or dig a canal is not given, the power of appropriating money cannot confer it, however generally it may be expressed. If there were no other limitation, the rights of the respective States over their soil and territory would operate as a restriction.

Whilst this appears to be a safe as well as fair construction of the Constitution, it is also that which has been practically given to it since the origin of the Government. Of this, the instances already mentioned furnish some evidence; and it is apprehended, that, upon the rigid principles of construction asserted both in regard to the enumeration of powers and the appropriation of revenue, the acts of the Federal Government, including all its branches, will exhibit a continued series of violations of the Constitution, from the first session after its adoption, to the present day.

It would behove us to turn over the statute book, and deliberately examine how, upon these principles, the laws giving bounties to fishermen; encouraging manufactures; establishing trading-houses with the Indians; erecting and constructing beacons, piers, and light-houses, purchasing libraries; adorning with paintings the Chamber of Congress; giving charity to suffering foreigners; constructing roads through the different States; and establishing banks—can be reconciled to the provisions of the Constitution. If as has been remarked by high authority,* the Constitutional question can be "precluded by repeated recognitions, under varied circumstances of the validity" of the exercise of power by Congress, "in acts of the Legislative, Executive, and Judicial branches of the Government, accompanied by indications, in different modes, of a concurrence of the general will of the nation," the advocates for these powers in the General Government can find little difficulty in supporting the pretension.

From all these considerations, your committee submit it as their opinion, that Congress has the power to construct roads and canals through the several States, with the assent of the States, on such terms as may be agreed on, leaving the jurisdictional rights in the States, respectively. To these and other national improvements, which may be found to be within the Constitutional powers of the Government, they think it advisable that the interest of the Government in the Bank of the United States should be appropriated. They forbear to give greater length to this report, by enlarging on the important advantages to be derived from these national improvements. They also forbear at this time to offer the details of any plan upon the subject, presuming it most proper to obtain the sense of the House of Representatives, in the first instance, on the general proposition. For this purpose, they respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That, in order to promote and give security to the internal commerce among the several States; to facilitate the safe and expeditious transportation of the mails, by the improvement of post roads, with the assent of the respective States; to render more easy and less expensive the means and provisions necessary for the common defence, by the construction of military roads, with the like assent of the respective States; and for such other internal improvements as may be within the Constitutional powers of the General Government;—it is expedient that the sum to be paid to the United States, by the twentieth section of the act to incorporate the subscribers to the Bank of the United States, and the dividends which shall arise from their shares in its capital stock, be constituted as a fund for internal improvement.

COMMUTATION OF SOLDIERS' PAY.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill for the commutation of soldiers' pay.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, as chairman of the Military Committee, stated a number of facts bearing on the subject of the bill. The number of men in the service at the close of the war was ascertained to have been 34,000; the number who died in service or were killed in battle was estimated at about 17,000; making in the whole about 50,000 soldiers (and heirs of soldiers) entitled to the bounty in land. For this number eight millions of acres would be required. But it was a number overrated; and he did not believe that 40,000 would come forward to claim the land bounty. Of the whole number of 50,000, he calculated that not more than half would commute for money—say 25,000. To pay this number the proposed commutation would require five millions of dollars, or 1,250,000 annually for four years; which mode of payment had been selected as well with a view to the benefit of the soldiers as to the relief of the Treasury. The committee, he said, had no doubt but the annual proceeds from the very land commuted would be sufficient to defray the whole amount; which would remove all objections of a financial nature, and he was not aware of any other. The measure, he hoped, would have the effect of cutting off all speculation, of which there was so much complaint, and by which the soldier was deprived of his rights under the influence of his necessities.

Proceedings.

A debate of some length arose on this bill, and particularly on its details, which did not, however, result in any final decision. Among others—

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, doubted much the policy of the bill, and feared that Congress, in passing it, would be legislating for the benefit of the speculator, and not of the soldier. To obviate this effect as far as he could, he proposed an amendment, going to defer the operation of the bill to a distant day, that general notice might be given of it.

Mr. CLAY (the Speaker) supported the measure by much zeal, and by arguments favorable to the soldier, and adverse to the speculator. He did not, however, entirely approve of the details of the bill; to which he moved amendments, going to exclude any but original grantees from the benefit of the provision, and reducing the commutation to one hundred dollars for every 160 acres, and two hundred dollars for every 320. These amendments, however, he waived for the present, to give place to a motion to strike out the first section of the bill, in order to try the principle of the bill.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, Mr. STORRS, of New York, Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, and Mr. CLAGETT, of New Hampshire, successively expressed their fears that it would be impossible so to arrange the details of the bill as to prevent its being converted to the benefit of the speculator. That the object of the bill is laudable was allowed; but, in addition to the objections of mere detail, it was also suggested, by some one or other of the gentlemen, that Congress had done their duty liberally, and had no need to do more; that the public funds could be better employed, if to spare; and, finally, that, if Congress once legislated on the subject, they would never see the end of supplementary laws, and individual claims for relief.

To all which Mr. CLAY briefly replied, that objections to the present details of the bill were no arguments at all, because the bill was open to amendment, and all that was necessary could be made, the House having once decided the principle. The principle of commutation he showed was so far from new, that Congress had already adopted it in regard to the heirs of deceased soldiers, allowing them the option of a limited pension in lieu of bounty land.

On the suggestion of Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, the subject having been opened, and opinions interchanged on it, to give time to reflect more upon them, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

And the House adjourned.

TUESDAY, December 16.

Mr. WILLIAM P. MACLAY and Mr. SERGEANT respectively presented petitions of sundry inhabitants of the State of Pennsylvania; which petitions respectively pray that additional duties may be imposed on pig iron, castings, and bar iron imported into the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

On motion of Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a post road, from Norfolk, in Virginia, by the Great Falls of the Roanoke, in North Carolina, and through the town of Danville, in Virginia, to the State of Tennessee.

On motion of Mr. WHITMAN, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were directed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the pensions granted to invalids of the Army, who served in the late war, in case of their decease before the expiration of the term of five years, from the time of granting the same, to the widow or children of such deceased invalid, if any he has left, or shall leave, to the end of the said term.

On motion of Mr. ALEXANDER SMYTH, the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of placing Henry Leonard, a soldier in the militia, who had his right arm disabled by the accidental discharge of a musket, while in the service of the United States, at Norfolk, on the list of pensioners.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, the Secretary of State was directed to communicate to this House a copy of the account of M. M. Noah, late Consul of the United States at Tunis, and a copy of any instructions given to him by the Department of State, respecting the ransom of prisoners at Algiers; and any information in his Department relative to the application, by M. M. Noah, of any moneys in his hands, as such Consul.

On motion of Mr. CORB, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of repealing so much of the third section of an act, entitled an "Act to establish a separate territorial government for the eastern part of the Mississippi Territory," as requires "that no judge shall sit more than twice in succession, in the same court;" and, also, so much of the said section as require more than one general court to be holden in each year, at the seat of government of said Territory.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the Clerk of the House was directed to procure, for the use of the House, three copies of Dallas's Reports, three copies of Cranch's Reports, and three copies of Wheaton's Reports.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the bill, entitled "An act to abolish the internal duties," with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The following resolution was submitted by Mr. BASSETT.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the daily compensation of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and Delegates for Territories, shall, until further provided for by law, be the same as in the year 1813.

The resolution was read; and, on the question, Will the House now proceed to consider the same? it was determined in the negative.

Mr. HERBERT, of Maryland, reported a bill, to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. NELSON, of Virginia, from the Committee on the Judiciary, made an unfavorable report on the petition of Richard Jeffries; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SCOTT, Delegate from Missouri Territory, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the better regulating the leasing and working the public lead mines belonging to the United States in the Missouri Territory, in such a manner as to protect the lessees in the quiet enjoyment of their leases, and to enable the Government to collect its rents.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the leasing and working the Salines belonging to the United States in the Missouri Territory, on such part thereof as it shall be deemed advisable to put into operation for public use.

CERTIFICATES AND INDENTS.

Mr. RHEA, of Tennessee, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims be instructed to inquire into the expediency of suspending, for one year, so much of the act, entitled "An act making further provision for the support of the public credit, and for the redemption of the public debt," passed the third day of March, 1795, as bars from settlement or allowance certificates, commonly called loan-office and final settlement certificates, and indents of interest.

Mr. R. said, that it was well known that, in June, 1795, a law was passed, suspending the operation of the statute for one year, and giving that time for the settlement of outstanding Revolutionary claims. He had heard it said, of a former Committee of Claims, that, while this statute existed in force, hope could not enter the door of the chamber in which they sat. Such certainly at present was the case with the Committee of Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, of which he was a member. He could see no possible reason why the just claims outstanding against the Government since the Revolutionary war, should not now be liquidated and paid off. On this subject, if it were necessary, Mr. R. observed that he could say a great deal. He had often felt warm when he had heard reports made in this House adverse to the just claims of such petitioners; and it was with no little violence to his own feelings that he had been compelled to make the report of yesterday, which had been ordered to lie on the table. He hoped his present motion would be agreed to, and that the committee would report a bill to suspend the operation of the act of limitation for one year at least. The nation, he said, was rich. The time had been when claims of this character had been laid over on the plea of poverty; that reason existed no longer, and he hoped that all just claims against the Government would now be paid.

The resolution was agreed to without opposition.

NATIONAL FLAG.

Mr. WENDOVER submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the flag of the United States, and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. W. said, in submitting this motion, that he should make but few remarks on this subject, not being a novel one; a bill relative thereto having been reported at the last session, but laid over from the pressure of business deemed of more importance. Had the flag of the United States never have undergone an alteration, he certainly should not, he said, propose to make a further alteration in it. But, having been altered once, he thought it necessary and proper that an alteration should now be made. It was his impression, and he thought it was generally believed, that the flag would be essentially injured by an alteration on the same principle as that which had before been made, of increasing the stripes and the stars. Mr. W. stated the incongruity of the flags in general use, (except those in the Navy,) not agreeing with the law, and greatly varying from each other. He instanced the flags flying over the building in which Congress sat, and that at the Navy Yard, one of which contained nine stripes, the other eighteen, and neither of them conformable to the law. It was of some importance, he conceived, that the flag of the nation should be designated with precision, and that the practice under the law should be conformed to its requisitions.

The motion was agreed to without opposition.

PETITION OF JOSEPH FORREST.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State on the petition of Joseph Forrest, made a report unfavorable to the prayer of said petition; which was read, and concurred in. The report is as follows:

That the petition, with accompanying documents, was, by a resolution passed on the 26th of February

DECEMBER, 1817.

Petition of Joseph Forrest.

H. OF R.

last, referred to the Secretary of State; that, in compliance with said resolution, the Secretary has submitted to the House of Representatives a report, which the committee beg leave to insert in their report, with a view to bring the subject more distinctly before the House.

The report of the Secretary of State appears to the committee to be final as to one point, viz: that the United States were charterers, but not insurers of the voyage, and, therefore, are not liable, by any principle of contract or retributive justice, to the petitioner. And although the committee perfectly accord in the generous sympathies expressed for the sufferings of a fellow-citizen, yet they cannot think it would be right for Congress, in this case, to follow the impulse of those feelings. On this point, however, the Secretary of State has given no opinion, but submits it to the discretion of the Legislature.

The claim may present itself in a point of view still stronger, when we reflect that the sufferings of the petitioner have been induced by embarking on a voyage for charitable purposes to a distant land. But the committee think we should not in the meantime forget that the relief afforded to foreigners in distress proceeded alone from the munificence of the Government. The petitioner had only the custody of the benefaction, not an interest in it; he asked, and no doubt received, for the use and risk of his vessel, precisely the same as if it had been destined to pursue "a voyage of ordinary traffic or indifferent intercourse." The petitioner cannot, in the opinion of the committee, be entitled to share with Government the beneficence of character which this transaction might impart. In deciding the case, therefore, they must return to the more regular, better settled, and, in their opinion, safer principles of justice, as applicable to an ordinary contract. And here the committee are happy to say again, that the opinion of the Secretary of State is in perfect accordance with their own, "that the United States are not bound by their covenants to indemnify the petitioner for his loss." They think this the only safe criterion to be adopted by Congress. The feelings of generosity are too indefinite to be admitted as a rule of conduct in a series of legislative acts.

Individuals may—yes, it is their duty to bestow seasonable gratuity on meritorious objects; but on individuals these demands will be limited. The number of them, if satisfied to their full extent, cannot be supposed to draw after them intralment and distress as a consequence to the benefactor. If they did, they would cease to be obligatory; for it is a plain rule of morality, that, to take from those who want in order to give to those who want, adds nothing to the sum of human happiness.

Of a nature similar to acts of individual beneficence was the measure of the Government for relieving the inhabitants of Venezuela from the afflicting calamities of an earthquake. Our own citizens, similarly situated would be entitled to, and would unquestionably receive, the most active, the most liberal munificence of Government. But the case of the petitioner is of a different kind; he prays relief from an ordinary accident, a common casualty, the loss of a vessel, such as might happen every day. Once adopt the principle that cases of this sort are to be relieved, and who can define the limit at which it may be possible to withhold munificence from the claims of suffering and distressed humanity? Every vessel wrecked at sea; every house consumed by fire; every field devastated by storm; in short, every accident resulting from any fortuitous concussion of elements, either natural or moral, would be the basis of an equal claim to your indulgent consideration. That they would multiply beyond all proportion to your ability to meet them, needs no comment to make it obvious to the House. Not only so, but distress in assumed, if not hypocritical forms, might assail you, till the burden imposed on the citizens for the purposes of general or unlimited relief would far exceed the misfortunes you should propose to alleviate. The committee think they see great danger in acting on such extended (perhaps some would say generous) principles. They see, on the other hand, great safety, if not a paramount duty, in conforming their decisions to the simple precepts of justice. If in the present case Congress should grant relief, may not a great number of cases, appealing with equal force to your generosity, arise during the present session? Allow one, and all of them must be entitled to the same benevolent respect, or Congress would be liable to the charge of invidious discrimination. It requires only a moderate foresight to discover that, instead of performing the duties assigned them by their constituents, instead of attending to the general concerns of the nation, Congress must, in a few years, be altogether employed in acts of charity and beneficence to individuals. Such a result, the committee think, would be as incompatible with the duties they owe their fellow-citizens, with that vigilance and attention generally to the affairs of the people whom they represent, as it would be inconsistent with the rules of wholesome legislation. They, therefore, recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the prayer of the petition ought not to be granted.

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 26th of February last, were referred the petition of Joseph Forrest, and the documents accompanying the same, has the honor of submitting the following report:

In the month of May, 1812, the schooner William Yeaton, George Travers, master, belonging to the petitioner, was chartered, at New York, by James Christie, as agent of the Government of the United States, to carry from New York to Laguayra, in South America, a cargo of flour, being part of a donation granted by the Congress of the United States to the inhabitants of that country, which had recently been afflicted by the calamity of an earthquake. In the charter-party for his voyage, the petitioner's agent, George Davis covenanted, among other things, that the said schooner should "be made ready, fitted, and provided by the said George Davis with all necessary and convenient things for such a schooner bound on the proposed voyage, and furnished with sufficient men and all other necessities during said voyage;" and the United States covenanted to pay for the cargo to be put on board the said schooner by them at the rate of one dollar and fifty cents for every barrel of flour, seventy-five cents for every half-barrel of the same, and forty cents for every bushel of corn, as the full freight and compensation for the proposed voyage, with a deduction of five per cent. for payment before the vessel sailed from New York; and it was agreed that the petitioner's agent, George Davis, should have the privilege of carrying to Laguayra on board of said schooner four passengers.

These were all the covenants stipulated on the part of the United States in the charter-party.

The vessel sailed from New York on the 28th of May, provided with a special passport, under the seal of the United States and the signature of the President, declaring that she was bound from the port of New York with a cargo of provisions intended as a donation from the Government of the United States to the unfortunate inhabitants of Venezuela, who had suffered by the late earthquakes there. She arrived at Laguayra on the 1st of July, 1812.

Before she had entirely discharged her cargo, the place, which had been in a state of revolt against the authority of Spain, was taken by the royal forces, and the vessel, with several others alike situated, was seized and condemned for a breach of the Spanish colonial laws, in going to the place without permission from any Spanish authority. The sentence of the court alleges that it was notorious to all the inhabitants of the United States, having been published in the gazettes, that all foreign vessels going to Laguayra, then in a state of insurrection, without a certificate of the Spanish Consul at the port of their departure, would, by virtue of repeated royal ordinances, be seized and confiscated; that, had the object of the Government of the North really been to relieve the unhappy inhabitants of Venezuela, who had suffered the desolation of an earthquake, the Spanish Consul could not have refused the aforesaid certificates when applied to such acts of humanity; and hence the court inferred it as clear that the sole object of the Government of the United States was to support the people of Venezuela in the obstinacy of their criminal independence; and that the voyage of the vessels in question, of which the petitioner's schooner was one, was to infringe the royal Spanish regulations, or to elude their fulfilment under such pretexts.

In the ensuing month of October the vessel was restored to Captain Travers, at the instance of Don Onis. A survey was made of her by four masters of American vessels, under authority of the Consul, Mr. Lowry, to ascertain the damages to the owner occasioned by the detention. They reported that the vessel had not suffered much damage; but they awarded to the owner twenty-four dollars a day demurrage for eighty-nine days of detention, from the day of her seizure to that of her restoration.

In the meantime, the war between the United States and Great Britain had commenced. It was impracticable for Captain Travers to freight, or even to bring back the vessel to the United States. He was obliged to sell her for the payment of the necessary expenses; and the proceeds of the sale were inadequate to defray them.

The loss was total. The only question is, upon whom must it fall—the United States or the petitioner? No express covenant in the charter-party binds the United States to indemnify the owner for arrest or detention of the vessel by a foreign Prince or State. It is not perceived that there was any implied contract to that effect. It was a subject to be covered by a policy of insurance, like the dangers of the sea. The United States were charterers, but not insurers of the voyage.

There is another point of view in which the question may be placed, more favorable to the claim of the petitioner, but upon which it must rest with the discretion of the Legislature to decide. The real object of the voyage was to perform a national act of beneficence and humanity for the relief of foreigners suffering under one of the most awful visitations of Heaven—an earthquake. It also happened that they were, at the time, suffering under a calamity no less dreadful, though inflicted by their fellow-creatures—they were in a state of civil war. The authority of the sovereign against whom they were struggling was at that time not recognised in the United States. There was no Spanish consul, acknowledged as such by the Government of the United States, and to whom the petitioner or master of the vessel could have applied to obtain that certificate which, in the estimation of the royal authorities at Laguayra, was indispensable to save her from seizure and confiscation. Those royal authorities, in a state of expulsion when the vessel was chartered and sailed from New York, by one of the vicissitudes of the war recovered possession of Laguayra immediately after the arrival of the vessel there. The seizure and confiscation of the vessel were not occasioned, therefore, by any fault or neglect of the master of the vessel, or of its owner.

The object of the American Government was not, as the passions of the moment misconstrued it, to foster and foment rebellion; it was not even ordinary traffic or indifferent intercourse. It was a virtuous impulse of the highest order; it was beneficence, to relieve the distress of other nations and tongues. In the fervor of this generous sentiment, if the Congress justly concluded that they were discharging their most imperious duty to their constituents by appropriating their money to alleviate the distresses of a distant and foreign land, would not the same, or at least a congenial sentiment, warrant them in extending their bounty to their own citizens, who, in the very act of carrying their munificence into effect, fall into unmerited misfortune? Will they suffer their own countryman to find his ruin in the very fulfilment of their gratuitous kindness to foreigners? As an ordinary question upon a contract, the subscriber respectfully reports it as his opinion that the United States are not bound by their covenants to indemnify the petitioner for his loss. Whether the consistency of benevolence, in a transaction founded altogether upon the basis of sacrificing pecuniary interest to a higher principle, requires that the prayer of the petitioner should be granted, he is bound to leave to the beneficent feeling and deliberate judgment of the House.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

COMMUTATION OF SOLDIERS' PAY.

The House resumed the consideration, in Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the commutation of soldiers' pay.

The question being on striking out the first section of the bill—

Mr. SAWYER, of North Carolina, opposed the bill by a variety of arguments, but principally on the ground of the heavy demand it would create on the Treasury. Money, he said, was power. He did not wish to live to see another empty Treasury. We had enough of that during the last war; and if that war had continued another year, he did not know what would have been the consequence. After advancing various illustrations of the value of a full Treasury, Mr. S. added, that he considered this bill as merely offering a premium on speculation. It was surprising, he said, how industrious we are when we get a little money into the Treasury to get it out again—no prodigal was ever more anxious to lavish a rich inheritance. For his part, he wished that there could be stationed at the door of the Treasury an angel with a flaming sword, to prohibit entrance to all who had not a pass from the Genius of Economy, and countersigned by the hand of Justice.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) rose to read to the House a new bill, by way of amendment to that now under consideration, which he should propose, if the House decided to reject the motion now pending. The proposed amendment consisted of several sections, providing distinctly for the three classes of those who had obtained patents, those who had obtained warrants, and those who had as yet applied for neither; provisions calculated equally to guard the Treasury, Mr. C. conceived, and to protect the interest of the soldier; and so worded, as to exclude from the benefit of the act all but original grantees, holding in their own possession the evidence of their right to the commutation. Mr. C. explained the operation which he anticipated to the various provisions of the bill. With regard to the doubts which had been expressed of the legislative power, Mr. C. said he had not the remotest doubt, and could not conceive of a doubt on the subject. Neither had he the smallest doubt that any contract made with any soldier for his right to bounty land, prior to the emanation of his patent, was totally void. The speculation which was anticipated in the quality of the land, by which the best would be retained by the soldier or bought by the speculator, and the worst be returned, by the process of commutation, to the Government, was guarded against in the amendment he had read. Mr. C. said, he believed, indeed, that the Government could not make a better speculation than in the repurchase of the public domains, which, he was compelled to admit, with the gentleman from Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) had been rather wastefully bestowed; in a manner justified, however, by the circumstances of the times, when men were wanting, and we had no money, but had land in plenty to offer them. The amount of money the measure might draw from the Treasury would be most economically applied by such an appropriation of it as he advocated.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, thanked his colleague for the amendment he had proposed. He was perfectly satisfied, he said, that there was not a man in the House who had not sympathized with the soldiers in the sacrifices they were obliged to make of their land; he was satisfied the proposed amendment would obviate the objections which had been suggested to the measure, and benefit the Government and the soldier, and not the speculator. If the amount of commutation were fixed at one dollar per acre, the soldier would know he could get $160 for his land, and the speculator must bid higher. Mr. D. was satisfied that all the lands were worth two dollars per acre, and the Government would be a great gainer by such commutations as were made. Mr. D. expressed his hope, therefore, that the motion to destroy the bill would be withdrawn.

Mr. STORRS, of New York, was opposed to the proposition for commutation in any shape, contending that its operation would be to benefit the speculator, and not the soldier whom it proposed to relieve. He went into a view of the mode in which it would have this operation. The soldier could not, he said, present in person his patent, warrant, or claim at the Treasury; it would cost him, generally, more than the whole value of his land to do it. He must do it by deputy; and this bill would give greater facility to the speculator than he now possesses of flitching from the soldier the greater part of his commutation, which to receive would require a mere order from the soldier, after his patent or relinquishment was deposited, in favor of any man who should have shaved it for him. To pass the proposed bill would be merely sowing a new crop of dragon's teeth, from which would spring up a fresh set of harpies, worse than those of which we now complain. The value of the land was daily better understood and appreciated by the soldier as well as the public, and the danger of his being imposed on, Mr. S. suggested, would every day be lessened. He could not well imagine, he said, under what right of legislation the right of the patentee to the land could, after a specified time, be barred, as proposed in the amendment which had been read by the Speaker; or how his vested right to the fee simple of the land could be taken from him by any subsequent act of Congress. Mr. S. made sundry other objections of detail to the measure of commutation, all which combined assured him it would be a measure worse than useless to the soldier, and not beneficial to the Government.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, advocated the bill, and replied to the main objections which had been proposed to its proposed details. He considered the measure highly important to the Government, and to the soldiers, and equally beneficial to both, and deprecated its being defeated by arguments against details susceptible of amendment in such a manner as to obviate the objections. The claimants, he believed, would be at no cost, as suggested by Mr. STORRS, in procuring their commutation. He would answer for all the Western country, that their Representatives in Congress would, with pleasure, perform the duty gratuitously for them, and he hoped he might, in like manner, answer for those from New York. He believed the passage of such a law would have the valuable effect to take the soldier out of the hands of the speculator, without the Government being called upon to purchase but a very small proportion of these lands. As to the idea of speculations in good or in bad lands, Mr. H. said the laws of the country provided that the soldier should have good land for his bounty; and if, among the land set apart for satisfying the soldier's claims, there was any bad land, it ought to be thrown back on the Government. A part of the land surveyed had been reserved as bad, and if more of the indifferent land should revert to the Government by this measure, it would be a measure of justice, and no more than we had solemnly promised to the soldier. Mr. H. made some remarks to show that the proceeds of the sales of public lands would be greater than some gentlemen had supposed, and amply sufficient to cover the immediate expenses of this measure, if adopted.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, in consequence of the call made on him to withdraw his motion to strike out the first section of the bill, rose to defend the position he had taken. He avowed that he was the last man who would be disposed to urge anything against the soldier; he would not merely say, the soldier was already paid, and for that reason refuse to give him more aid; he would not insist upon the pound of flesh as stated in the bond, but if the soldier needed the aid of Government, although once paid, the Government ought to extend its charity to him. Our soldiers, he said, had indeed been paid, and well paid; some of them so well, that they had received an hundred and twenty-four dollars of bounty, in money, and an hundred and sixty acres of land, and never served the Government at all. Did the Government mean to act on the principle of charity to those who had served it? Mr. H. asked. And, if it did, were these soldiers the class most deserving its bounty? He believed not; but that it would be more properly applied to the disbanded officers, and particularly to the grade from captain downwards. The private soldier had been well paid, and clothes and arms found him; the officer, clothing and arming himself upon the pittance allowed him, had sought for glory for his reward—but, before he obtained it, he had been disbanded and cast upon the world. Mr. H. said he should be for relieving this meritorious class of men; but not so much for adding to the rewards already bestowed on the soldier. But, he proceeded to argue, if the measure was expedient, on this ground, it would not in practice answer the expectations of its advocates. He referred to the arguments originally urged in support of the bounty law, to show that one of the objects of the land bounty had been avowed to be the settlement of our frontiers by military men, in order to defend the country from invasion by the savages. That object, he intimated, appeared to be cast aside by the advocates of this bill, who were now anxious that the land should revert to the United States. Mr. H. proceeded to examine the details of the amendment suggested, to show that, in every shape, speculators would derive the principal advantage from this bill. Notwithstanding warrants were not transferable, there were means, he said, by which the property of these soldiers might be alienated by them; for instance, by power of attorney authorizing a person to transfer all lands that belong to the constituent, and that power rendered irrevocable, with a covenant of further assurance, &c. But, Mr. H. asked, are we not doing worse than aiding the speculators? Is not the Government becoming the grand speculator? Is it not going to speculate on the soldier? The minimum price of our land, he said, was two dollars per acre, and we are going to buy it from the soldier at half that price! This would not only be fixing the price for ourselves, but for others; for the lands would not sell for more than the Government gave for them. On the whole, Mr. H. concluded by saying, he was inclined to think, that in any shape the bill would not benefit the soldier.

Mr. CUSHMAN, of New York, next addressed the Chair, on the same side as Mr. HOLMES, denying that any substantial benefit could result from the passage of the bill, either to the soldier or to the nation. He questioned the certainty of the proceeds of the sales of the lands commuted being sufficient to pay the amount of the commutation; deducing his argument from the amount of sales of public lands heretofore, he concluded that it would require twelve years' proceeds of the sales of public lands to answer the object. This would certainly be a heavy tax on the Treasury. Mr. C. denied the probability of speculators coming into the market with the soldiers' lands for sale; because, as it appeared from the President's Message, that speculators had purchased at the public sales large quantities of the public land, awaiting the benefit of the rise expected to take place in them. But, if the speculators should come in competition with the Government, the whole amount they could sell would not sensibly affect the public receipts from the sale of the public lands. These were a few of Mr. C.'s remarks.

Mr. HUNTINGTON, of Connecticut, was opposed to striking out the first section of the bill. His object was not to increase the bounty of the soldiers, but to give an opportunity to gentlemen to propose amendments. He thought it perfectly fair to allow gentlemen to make the bill as perfect as they could, and to reserve the right of voting against the bill thereafter, if he thought proper.

Mr. COMSTOCK, of New York, said, in the commencement of his remarks, that it might not be prudent for a man who had spent the greater part of his life in mixing up medicines, to mingle in the conflict of lawyers on this question; but the interest he felt in it, superseded such considerations. He was decidedly opposed to striking out the first section, because, as he proceeded to show, he thought Congress could legislate with propriety and beneficially on the subject. The Government, in granting this bounty land, he admitted, had been liberal, but not too much so; but we have to deplore that speculation has grown out of it which required the interposition of the Legislature; which, he argued, ought not to be withheld on the plea that abuses might grow out of any legislation on the subject. In proof of existing abuses, he said, it was well known that rights to one hundred and sixty acres had been repeatedly sold by the soldiers at this place, at the rate of one hundred and sixty acres for fifty dollars; and, if he had chosen to have availed himself of the improvidence of a poor soldier before he left home, he might have obtained his right for ten dollars; and they had frequently been sold, he presumed, at from ten dollars to one. If such an evil admitted of no remedy, it was a prodigy. But Mr. C. thought there was a remedy, and that this bill would afford it. Even the stand which had been already taken in this House, would have the most beneficial effect, as it would convince the soldier that many gentlemen on this floor believed his land to be worth vastly more than his fellow-soldiers had sold for. When he offered the motion which had given rise to the introduction of this bill, Mr. C. said he had hoped something would grow out of it; and if, unfortunately, the bill should not pass, he believed the agitation of the question would be found to have cured much of the evil.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, next expressed his views on the main subject of the bill. He thought the measure neither sustainable on the principle of justice, nor on that of munificence—justice requiring only that the Government should fulfil its contract with the soldiers, &c. He did not think it consistent with the dignity of the United States to turn speculator and purchase land from the soldier at a certain price, that it might be sold out at a double rate. The idea of purchasing lands on speculation he thought novel, and unworthy of the Government, if not unauthorized by the Constitutional powers of Congress. If munificence was the argument on which the measure was to be sustained, he thought there were a thousand ways in which it could be more advantageously employed, even in favor of the soldier. Soldiers, he said, always had been speculated on, and you might as well attempt to shield his body from the bayonet of an enemy, as to shield the soldier from the arts of the speculator, by any provisions of law. Mr. L. was in favor of striking out the section, because he believed the measure would be of no benefit to the soldier, and was inexpedient as regarded the Government.

Mr. CLAY vindicated the amendment which he had suggested from misconceptions which had prevailed in the course of the debate on it. In reply to the objection made by Mr. STORRS to the power of barring the soldiers' rights, in certain cases, Mr. C. denied its force, and showed that such a power had been repeatedly exercised by the Government in carrying into effect its general power to levy taxes, &c. As to the necessity the soldier would be under of procuring his commutation by an attorney, Mr. C. said he did presume there was no gentleman who had the honor of a seat on this floor who would hesitate to receive and remit, to any soldier, his commutation without expense to him. To those who entertained such squeamish fears of the Government engaging in speculation, Mr. C. said, he could use no argument. If they could calmly view the spectacle of the sale of one hundred and sixty acres of land for ten dollars, and could be alarmed at the idea of speculation on the part of Congress, no argument would move them. The idea of commutation, Mr. C. said, was not new; it runs through our statute book; it began with the soldier of the Revolution; and has been applied to the heirs and representatives of the same class of men to whom it was now proposed further to extend it. Hundreds of cases might be found in which the Government had offered a present less for a greater contingent value; and nothing like the reproach of speculation was justly chargeable on this measure. Here was a vast public domain, cast away by the Government from the necessity of the times; and what was now proposed to him who was about to be rifled of their share of it by speculators? To take, in lieu of the sum he is to get from the speculator, a sum vastly larger. Mr. C. quoted a letter he had just seen from an officer in one of our forts expressing his hopes that this bill would pass, and stating some of the impositions practised on the soldier within his knowledge. He could not enter, he said, into the feelings of gentlemen who could look down into the garrets of the country, and see these shameless speculations, and not make an effort to redeem the land from this vile reproach. Nor could he agree with gentlemen who had Constitutional scruples on this subject. This was so fashionable nowadays—the Constitution had become so much a nose of wax in the hands of politicians—that no argument from it excited surprise. The land of the country, and the money of the country, were perfectly within the power of Congress; and he was not aware of any clause in the Constitution forbidding them to exchange the one for the other. He admitted that justice, so denominating strict law, did not require this measure at the hands of Congress; but it was a mixed measure of gratitude, of justice, and of policy—a consultation of the interest of the soldier, and a prevention of most odious speculation. Decided how it might be, if rejected, he should avail himself of the consolation of the gentleman from New York, (Mr. COMSTOCK,) that whatever might be the fate of the bill, its introduction might have had the effect, by reaching the ear of some solitary individual, of enabling him to get something nearer the value of his land-right than he would otherwise have gotten.

But, said Mr. C., the strong box! the defenders of the Treasury were alarmed at the vast out-goings this bill might cause. Mr. C. said their alarm was needless. The Government might not have, perhaps, to pay twenty thousand dollars in a year for commutation money—for the effect and the great value of the measure would be to fix the market price at a sum higher than the commutation; which, however, the soldier would have the option to take, if he could not get more. With regard to the settlement of the country, which it was feared would be defeated by this measure, Mr. C. said that he came from a part of the country which was anxious to see the forests felled and the savannahs redeemed to cultivation; and, if he believed in the supposed effect of the measure, he should be of a different opinion. But there was nothing in that argument; for the soldier who intended to settle his land would yet do it, the commutation bill notwithstanding. This bill would not prevent the settlement of an acre, &c.

Mr. SOUTHARD, of New Jersey, viewing this as a great question of national policy, affecting not only the national property, but the rights of forty thousand individuals, and which therefore ought to be maturely considered, moved that the Committee rise.

Mr. SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, seconded the motion, in order to move a recommitment of the bill, with instructions to report a provision for substituting a pension for life in lieu of the proposed sum of money to be given by way of commutation. He did not, he said, wish that the Government should embark in this business by way of speculation. The interest of the soldier alone should be consulted. As to land it was of no value generally, to him, because, for the most part it was so situated that it was impossible for him to get at it; because he was generally ignorant of its value, and did not even know how to go about to get his title. A pension during life might be of some service to him, and was greatly preferable to a sum given at once, which would be wasted as soon as received.

The Committee rose, and after Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, protesting against pensioning fifty thousand men for life, Mr. SERGEANT'S wish was overruled, and the Committee had leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, December 17.

Another member, to wit: from North Carolina, JOSEPH H. BRYAN appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, reported a bill for the relief of Samuel Arkman, and a bill for the relief of Joseph Earwood; which were severally twice read, and committed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of John G. Mackall; which was read, and concurred in.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire what provisions are necessary to give effect to the laws of the United States within the State of Mississippi.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the pay of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, and the Delegates from the Territories of the United States; and the said committee had leave to report by bill or otherwise.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, moved that this committee consist of twenty members, that one might be selected from each State, and thus bringing thereto the views and impressions of the various parts of the country, might agree upon a report which would save the House the alternative of exhibiting itself before the world in the unpleasant attitude of debating its own compensation. This number being objected to by Mr. HOLMES, who wished the usual number of seven to be appointed, Mr. LIVERMORE withdrew his motion, and a committee of seven were ordered to be appointed; and Messrs. HOLMES of Massachusetts, PITKIN, ANDERSON of Kentucky, MOORE, STORRS, ABBOTT, and NEWTON, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON,

Resolved, That the Secretary of War be, and he is hereby instructed to report to this House the amount of the pensions which have been granted to the widows and orphans of deceased officers and soldiers of the late war, specifying the number of each grade of officers to whose widows or children the pensions have been granted.

On motion of Mr. TYLER, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing offices to be erected for the safekeeping of the records, papers, and documents, of the several district courts of the United States, at or near the places of holding said courts, respectively.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT,

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the judges of the district courts, in the several districts, and the judges of the Supreme Court of the United States, within their respective circuits, to supply any vacancies that may have happened, by reason of the death, resignation, or disability, of the general commissioners of bankruptcy, appointed by the President under the authority of the act, entitled "An act to amend the judicial system of the United States," where the same may be necessary to complete the execution of any pending commission of bankruptcy.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a resolution "authorizing the distribution of certain public documents;" and they have also passed the resolution "directing a distribution of certain laws among the members of the Fifteenth Congress," with amendments, in which resolution and amendments they ask the concurrence of this House.

The resolution authorizing the distribution of certain public documents was read the first and second time, and ordered to be read a third time to day. It was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The amendments to the resolution, directing a distribution of certain laws among the members of the Fifteenth Congress, were read, and concurred in by the House.

The amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act to abolish the internal duties," were read, and concurred in by the House.

ESTIMATE OF APPROPRIATIONS.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following communication from the Treasury Department, which was ordered to be printed, with the accompanying documents:

DECEMBER, 1817.

Claims for Losses in Michigan.

H. OF R.

TREASURY DEPARTMENT,
December 17, 1817.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith for the information of the House of Representatives, an estimate of the appropriations for the service of the year 1818, amounting to $10,925,191 62, viz:

For the Civil List - - -	$1,070,708 02
For miscellaneous expenses - - -	490,308 51
For intercourse with foreign nations -	487,666 64
For the Military Establishment, including arrearsages, and Indian department - - -	6,265,132 25
For the Naval Establishment, including the marine corps - - -	2,611,876 20
	<hr/> $10,925,191 62 <hr/>

The funds out of which the appropriations for the year 1818 may be discharged, are the following:

1. The sum of six hundred thousand dollars, annually reserved by the act of the 4th of August, 1790, out of the duties and customs, towards the expenses of Government.

2. The proceeds of the stamp duties, and the duty on sugar refined within the United States.

3. The surplus which may remain of the customs and internal duties, after satisfying the pledge for which they are pledged and appropriated.

4. Any other unappropriated money which may come into the Treasury during the year 1818.

I have the honor to be, very respectfully, sir, your most obedient servant,

WM. H. CRAWFORD.

The Honorable the SPEAKER of the House of Representatives.

CLAIMS IN MICHIGAN.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of State, transmitting his report on the petition of sundry inhabitants of Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, referred to him on the 6th of February, 1817, which were referred to the committee on the 10th instant, on the petition from sundry inhabitants on the river Raisin, in the said Territory.

The report is as follows:

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 6th of February last, was referred the petition of sundry citizens of the United States, inhabitants of the district of Detroit, in the Territory of Michigan, has the honor of submitting the following report:

The petitioners allege that they have suffered great losses of property by the violation, on the part of the British forces, and especially by the Indian savages, then acting as auxiliaries under them, of the capitulation by which, on the 16th of August, 1812, the Territory of Michigan was surrendered to the British General Brock; one article of which capitulation stipulated that private persons and property of every description should be respected.

That, by this violation of the capitulation, the petitioners acquired a just claim upon the British Government for indemnity and satisfaction, which they expected the Government of the United States would have prevailed upon that of Great Britain to make, by paying the petitioners for all the losses and damages sustained by them in consequence thereof.

That the United States, having concluded a Treaty of Peace, and subsequently a Commercial Treaty, with Great Britain, without mention being made of the Territory of Michigan, or of these claims of the petitioners, they have thereby lost their claim of redress and indemnity upon the British Government; but that the obligation of making it has thereby devolved upon the United States, to whose justice and liberality they appeal accordingly for remuneration and payment.

Extracts from the documents upon the records of the Department of State are herewith annexed, serving to show the liberal principles upon which the Government of the United States were desirous of proceeding in terminating the war, and at the same time the anxious care with which they urged a provision of indemnity for the citizens of the United States who had suffered loss or damages such as those complained of by the petitioners. This provision was insisted on until it was distinctly known that the only alternative to its abandonment was the inevitable continuance of the war.

How far the United States themselves are answerable to their individual citizens for the losses and damages occasioned by the enemy, and unhappily incident to the condition of war, it is for the wisdom of Congress alone to determine.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 16, 1817.

[Extract from letter of instructions, dated Jan. 28, 1814.]

Mr. Monroe, Secretary of State, to the American Plenipotentiaries appointed to treat of peace between the United States and Great Britain.

On the claim to indemnity for spoiliations, I have only to refer you to what was said in the former instructions. I have to add that, should a treaty be formed, it is just in itself, and would have a happy effect on the relations of the two countries if indemnity should be stipulated on each side for the destruction of all unfortified towns and other private property, contrary to the laws and usages of war. It is equally proper that the negroes taken from the Southern States should be returned to their owners, or paid for at their full value.

Extracts from the project of a treaty of peace submitted by the American Plenipotentiaries to the British Commissioners at Ghent on the 10th of November, 1814, and returned by the latter with accompanying remarks.

ART. 10. His Britannic Majesty and the United States shall, by all the means in their power, restrain the Indians living within their respective dominions from committing hostilities against the territories and citizens or subjects of the other party. And both Powers also agree, and mutually pledge themselves, if, at any time, war should unhappily break out between them, not to employ any Indians, nor to admit of their aid and co-operation in the prosecution of the war against the other party.

[ART. 10. Inadmissible.]

ART. 13. It is agreed that indemnity shall be made by His Britannic Majesty to the citizens of the United States for all losses and damages sustained by them during the late war between Great Britain and France, and prior to the commencement of the present war, by reason of irregular or illegal captures, seizures, or condemnations of vessels and other property, under color of authority, contrary to the known and established rules of the law of nations. And it is also agreed that indemnity shall be made by each of the contracting parties to the citizens or subjects of the other party for all losses and damage sustained subsequent to the commencement of the present war, by reason of the seizure or condemnation of the vessels or cargoes belonging to the subjects or citizens of the one party, which, in the ordinary course of commerce, happened at the commencement of hostilities to be in the ports of the other party; and by reason of the destruction of unfortified towns, and the pillage or destruction of private property, and the enticement and carrying away of negroes, contrary to the known and established rules and usages of war between civilized nations.

[ART. 13. Inadmissible.]

The first part of the tenth article appears to be unnecessary, and the stipulation contained in the whole of it altogether inadmissible. Though His Majesty's Government sincerely hopes that a renewal of the war between His Majesty and the United States may be far distant, yet the undersigned cannot consent to enter into any engagement as to what shall be the conduct of their Government if such a war should unfortunately occur.

With respect to the thirteenth article, the indemnifications proposed by it, as applied to the actual circumstances of the war, are so unprecedented and objectionable, that any further perseverance of the American Plenipotentiaries in requiring them is not anticipated by the undersigned; if, however, contrary to expectation, indemnifications of this kind should be required, all hope of bringing the negotiations to a favorable issue must prove abortive. The undersigned are instructed explicitly to declare that, as their Government makes no claim on account of losses sustained by British subjects arising out of a war declared by the United States, so neither can their Government agree to make compensation for losses sustained in such a war by the American people.

COMMUTATION OF SOLDIERS' PAY.

The House then again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for commuting the bounty lands of the soldiers of the late Army, the motion to strike out the first section being still under consideration.

Mr. BALL, of Virginia, rose in opposition to the bill. It was impossible, he said, for any legislative provision to put down speculation on the soldiers; and even if it could be put down, it would drive from the market all purchasers, all competition, and thus do an injury to that class who might be benefited by a fair sale. If the bill were to pass in the present shape, the soldier would be told by the speculator that the Government knew the value of his land, had fixed a price on it, but was unwilling or unable to pay that price; he would offer to advance the money to the soldier, but would demand a premium for prompt payment. It would, Mr. B. said, be as well to attempt to stop a steamboat with a straw as to prevent a prodigal soldier, used to dissipation, from becoming the prey of speculation. Mr. B. referred to the cases of Revolutionary soldiers who had petitioned for relief in vain; those brave men who had fought for our independence, and broken the bands of tyranny asunder; of whose toils we now enjoyed the benefits. Their petitions were neglected, their very names forgotten. When these war-worn veterans received justice in this House, but not till then, could he hear, without a blush, of liberality to others, or would he vote for this bill.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, thought much of the objection which had been urged against the bill arose from a small class of cases, which would not comprehend more than three thousand. But, he contended, if it could be shown that the great number to whom patents were yet to issue would be benefited by the bill, it was not a sufficient objection that those would not participate in it who had sold their patents. If good would come to the many who are yet to receive patents, he cared not for those who had received and sold theirs; nor could they charge the Government with injustice or a want of generosity to them. In making this commutation, the soldier received more than he would get from speculators, and the Government would also receive advantage from the change. In doing this, Mr. A. said, he disregarded the character which was imputed to the transaction; and if he could benefit the soldier he cared not for the name of speculator. But this could not be: the soldier himself would enter his everlasting protest against so unjust a reproach, while he enjoyed the benefit of the act. It was true, as was argued, that this bill might not entirely stop speculations on the soldier; but, if they still took place, Mr. A. said, the amount of sacrifice would be much less. The security being good, it would be the remoteness of payment alone which could sink the value of the commutation. Mr. A. adverted successively to the objections, that the Government could not spare the money, and that this act would retard the settlement of the territory; and entered into various arguments in reply on these points. He commended the present system of managing the public lands, and said no change in it was necessary: it had all the effect which could have been anticipated or conceived, and would soon diffuse through our whole territory one widespread population. He argued, also, that this bill would exalt the reputation of the Government for justice and liberality, and would prove a solid benefit in future wars by facilitating the enlistment of men. This he thought an important consideration, and ought not to be overlooked. If this measure was not adopted, the lands would fall into the hands of a few holders, who would dispose of them to the detriment of agriculture, or at a price less than the minimum price of the public lands; and the lands thus disposed of had been selected for their goodness, and were the best in the country. These consequences, as well as others, Mr. A. said, could be, and ought to be, avoided by the passage of the bill.

Mr. COLSTON, of Virginia, said it was admitted there was no moral obligation to pass the bill; it was advocated only in the spirit of liberality to the soldier. To show the expediency of this measure, Mr. C. entered into a course of reasoning to prove the greater obligation and necessity there existed for abolishing the duties on various imports, and thus relieving the laboring class from very heavy burdens. Among other objects, he referred particularly to the duty on brown sugar, the consumption of which was nearly twenty millions of pounds; and of coffee, of which was consumed eleven millions of pounds, the latter of which bore a duty of five cents a pound; these and the duty on salt, added together, amounted to many millions which were annually taken out of the pockets of the people. He asked whether it was right in Congress to take any step which would render the continuation of these heavy duties necessary? and referred to the Treasury report to show that our resources were inadequate to spare the funds necessary to carry this bill into effect and leave in the Treasury the sum which it was agreed ought to remain there. He protested against continuing the existing burdens on other classes of the community for the benefit of these soldiers, who had received such enormous bounties during the war—even if the bill would be beneficial to the soldiers, which he doubted; as in his opinion to make the commutation payable in instalments, as was proposed, would place them in worse circumstances than before. On a proper occasion, Mr. C. said, he could show feeling for the soldiers as well as other gentlemen; but in providing for them he could not forget the millions laboring under inconvenience from the taxes which were laid on the necessities of life; and concluded by declaring he could not vote for this bill in any shape whatever.

Mr. BALDWIN, of Pennsylvania, followed in support of the bill. He thought it very incorrect to suppose this bill would favor the speculator; because, if the Government offered nothing for the land, the speculator would be without competition, and the soldier left to his mercy. Mr. B. referred to the history of the lands given by Pennsylvania, by Virginia, and by the United States to the Revolutionary soldiers, to show the great depreciation which would probably take place, without the interference of Government. The Revolutionary bounty lands of Pennsylvania had actually been sold for four cents an acre, and those of Virginia and the United States for about thirty-three dollars per hundred acres. But if the Government were now to offer even one hundred dollars for the present bounty, it would interpose a very great barrier to speculation. And admitting all the alleged ingenuity of speculators, still there would be many cases benefited by the bill; the others would be no worse off than they were before. It would be a sufficient reason with him, Mr. B. said, to support the bill, if he thought he could rescue one-tenth of them from speculation. He adverted to the opinions respecting the validity of powers of attorney, and argued that a power was irrevocable only where there was an interest legally acquired; but in this case there was a special provision of law that the title should not vest in the attorney. It was absurd to suppose Government would make a purchase, and not take from the seller the power of selling to others; and it was a plain rule of law, that a second purchaser, not knowing of a previous purchase, and having no notice, would be left in complete possession, if the title-papers had been left in the hands of the seller. He contended that the soldier had strong claims; that, moreover, in this case the nation would acquire a valuable estate, and that it was a fair subject of legislation. In reply to the objection that the revenue would not justify this measure, Mr. B. said he held those responsible for supplying the funds who had insisted on diminishing the revenue by repealing the taxes. The House had been told the other day that the Treasury was overflowing; now, that it was empty. He insisted that all fair and laudable appropriations must be made, and the money must be in the Treasury to meet them; it was too late to plead against a proper appropriation, that there was no money. Mr. B. adverted also to the Constitutional objection which had been stated yesterday, and asked if gentlemen could be serious in disputing this power, which had been exercised by the Government for five-and-thirty years.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, again addressed the Committee at some length in opposition to the bill, chiefly in illustration and defence of the arguments he had advanced yesterday.

Mr. STORRS, of Massachusetts, also spoke again briefly in opposition to the bill. He reviewed a part of Mr. BALDWIN's arguments, some of which he said proved too much. The rule of law which had been stated, he said, was never extended in law or equity to a voluntary purchaser, as the United States would be in this case. By fixing a minimum price, he admitted it might lop off some of the speculators; but until a barrier could be erected to the folly and avarice of the soldier and the rapacity of the speculator the bill would be useless, for the evil would remain untouched.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, said he should always rise with pleasure to defend his remarks from any inconsistency with which they might be charged. He did remark, yesterday, that a power of attorney might be executed before the issuing the patent, giving a general authority to convey all lands acquired and to be acquired, and it would authorize the attorney to sell the soldier's land after the patent was drawn; and though this opinion had been denounced as one which would render a judge liable to impeachment, he still was not able to discover how either himself or the opinion could be subject to such animadversion. The gentleman from Pennsylvania (Mr. BALDWIN) conceives, said Mr. H., that he has discovered that the evil which I deprecate is cured in the very case which I stated; that the interest of the attorney being apparent in the title of attorney, such conveyance would be void. If so, I will only observe that he, on the other hand, has stated a case—that of a letter of attorney—where the interest is not apparent, in which a conveyance might be made in spite of the constituent, and be valid. I still insist that a conveyance under a power which might be executed would be good. But while he was speaking of that gentleman's remarks, Mr. H. said he would notice Mr. BALDWIN's reasoning relative to the repeal of the internal taxes; and said he could not yet perceive how it could be inferred, that if those taxes may be repealed we are bound to make this commutation to the soldier. I deem it possible, said Mr. H., that we may not need those taxes, and yet not be authorized to unlock the Treasury for every occasion. Did it follow, he said, that if this tax on the people may be dispensed with, we have money enough to repurchase lands which we do not want? Mr. H. considered the right question to be, whether the nation could afford to purchase back this land, upon the prospect of the advantages which might result to the soldier. He felt no such squeamishness as had been ascribed to the opposers of this bill. He did not perceive why there was to be given to the soldier but half as much as the Government asked for the land. If the land is worth more, said Mr. H., let us not speculate upon the soldier. If it is worth no more, we fix a price, and diminish the price of these lands in the market; and, by taking back the greater part of these lands, we diminish the prospect of the settlement, and consequently the value of those lands retained by the soldier or his heirs. In this way the Government itself reduces the value, and puts a weapon in the hands of the speculator, to induce the soldier to sell cheap. The impression is easily made, said Mr. H., that we who oppose this bill are opposed to the interest of the soldier. No, sir; so long as I shall have the opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject, I shall always support and defend the rights and interests of the defender of my country. But our feelings in this case are misconstrued. The advocates of this bill introduce to us the war-worn veteran: with the eye of the imagination you behold him coming from the way of the wilderness, supported by a crutch and a wooden leg; "pale is his visage, and marked with a scar;" naked and lacerated is his head, where the scalp was torn by the merciless savage. You survey the victim of your country's glory; the tear starts in the eye; the blood freezes in the veins; Champlain, Bridgewater, Erie, and Orleans, rush into the mind; an eternal load of gratitude presses you down; you throw open the strong box, "There, my good fellow, take to your satisfaction, and God Almighty bless you!" He pockets the money. Again you survey this mouldering monument of your gratitude; but upon further examination you find that his leg was not wood, but flesh and blood; his crutch dwindles to a cane; you inspect the scar on his face, and discover that it is a beautiful dimple; you examine the wound where the scalp was torn, and find that he had been only shorn a little too close by his barber; you throw off the soldier's coat, and behold a smart, spruce, sprightly, young speculator, with his pockets crammed full of warrants, and patents, and powers of attorney. That was the man for whom you intended to legislate. This is the scoundrel for whom you have legislated. But the fraud is discovered when it is too late.

Commutation of Soldiers' Pay.

DECEMBER, 1817.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, said, the views of the friends of the bill were honorable, as the object was to relieve the soldier and shut the door against speculation; and if this could be accomplished he would concur with them; but he contended that this could not be done, and that there were more important matters of legislation which required all the funds they had a right to demand of the people. The Treasury, he conceived, was not so abundant as had been represented, nor did he think the surplus estimated a large one for this nation. It was proper, therefore, Mr. B. said, to see if the appropriation required could be afforded, and he went into an examination of the anticipated resources, to show that it could not. Mr. B. took, incidentally, a pretty extensive view of the national policy on several subjects, particularly the subject of domestic manufactures, which he believed would sink without further and greater encouragement, and argued that a proper regard for these and other great objects now before the House—the proposed provision for the Revolutionary patriots, the invalid corps, &c., which he enumerated and dwelt on, was incompatible with the sacrifice of millions of money for the object now under consideration; neither did he think the soldiers deserved that additional bounty. But he would be willing to commute with them after other necessary objects had been attended to; though, he argued, that it would be much better to leave soldiers in possession of their land, which they would, in a large proportion, settle and improve, and leave to their children, than, by buying it, give them the means of indulging their bad propensities to excess and ruin.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, commenced his remarks, by denying that the principle of this bill was charity, as had been alleged—the subject was one of policy. We get, said he, in the commutation more than a quid pro quo, more than an equivalent; for the Government would give one hundred dollars for what was worth three hundred. He called the attention of the Committee to one fact, which was, that the Yazoo speculation itself did not present a scene of greater speculation than would be exhibited if sixteen millions of acres were put into market, in the hands of men so necessitous, as now many of them were, as to be asking charity in the streets; and this land, too, of the best quality. He did not contend that there was a legal obligation to do this act; but there certainly was a moral obligation, whether the soldier be viewed either as vicious or ignorant—he was to be viewed as a starving object, no matter from what cause; and there was a moral obligation to take him out of the hands of speculators. To justify this bill, Mr. J. referred to the former practice of the Government, and to the recommendation of the late President of the United States, to whom Mr. J. paid the tribute of his highest respect for his virtues, his talents, and his long and faithful services. The right to pass this bill was clear; and shall we, said he, let the time forever pass unimproved, because there be no legal obligation for it?

Proceedings.

H. OF R.

He maintained, that the House could suppress speculation, and that this bill would do it. He would say, that they should take the land for less than its value, should receive no more than the commutation price, and he would do anything short of violating the Constitution, to enforce it. Mr. J. dwelt warmly on this point, and urged the Committee not to let the moment for this measure pass away forever. As for charity, he knew it was out of the question. There had been none extended to the gallant officer, and he expected none for the soldier, unless he came here and held up his bleeding hand or his mutilated stump, to beg for it. On the plea of charity, therefore, he did not support the passage of the bill, but it was on the score of sound policy, and that alone.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) again rose, partly in reply to the opponents of the bill, and partly on its details. In ninety-nine cases in a hundred, he said, the patentees who intended to sell their land had probably already done so. There was another difference between the patentee and those who were yet to receive their land—the former knows the value of his land, while the others do not; one will take advantage of the commutation, the others will not. Thus would arise a difference in the provision which should be made. In discussing the details of the bill, Mr. C. said, he had no doubt it was in the power of the Government to compel the purchasers to give in notice of their titles, or make any other regulation of property for its registration or security. He denied that the Government would be, in this case, a voluntary purchaser, in the sense suggested; it was a repurchase of estate, and a case in which the subsequent purchaser would hold without notice from the previous purchaser. Mr. C. read the act granting the bounty, to show that it was impossible for the soldier to alienate his right to the land before obtaining a patent; and said, he should be glad to find some of the speculators, some of the knowing ones, taken in, who had endeavored to deprive the soldier of his hard-earned property. By fixing a value on this land, Mr. C. said, it would immediately rise in market; and, if the commutation was settled at one hundred dollars, he did not believe they would have to pay fifty thousand dollars annually; and so fully was he convinced of the expediency of this measure, he declared his belief, that if Government had to borrow the money at six per cent. to make the purchase, it would still be a great gain, besides the consideration of alleviating the soldier. Mr. C. remarked, in reference to the just censures which had been denounced against speculation, that he did not attach speculation, in its odious sense, to many of the purchasers—there were many purchases fairly made. It was to those who dogged the soldier to the grogshops, and who misrepresented to him the value of his land, that he attached the epithet in its execrable sense—it was against such that he would extend the arm of the Government. Mr. C. said, this property had been parted with at a moment of great pressure and public need; and it was incumbent on the Government, now that it was able to do so, to take it back; when, at the same time, by doing so, you render a service to yourself and to the party from whom it was received.

Mr. CLAY then, for the reasons already stated in the proceedings of this day, offered a substitute for the bill, which he had prepared, (Mr. HOLMES having for that purpose first withdrawn his motion to strike out the first section;) when the Committee of the Whole rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, December 18.

Mr. SHAW presented a petition of sundry manufacturers of cotton and woollen goods, in Berkshire county, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that further measures may be adopted for the security and encouragement of domestic manufactures.—Referred to the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. POINDEXTER submitted the following proposition of amendment to the rules and orders of the House; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That the standing rules and orders of the House be amended, in this, to wit: that the Committee on Private Land Claims shall consist of seven members.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, reported a bill making provision for the establishment of additional land offices in the Territory of Missouri; which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, to whom were referred sundry reports of facts, in particular cases, submitted for his decision, by the Commissioner of Claims, for lost property, &c., made reports unfavorable to the cases of John Manning, for Caroline Fenwick; of the Levy Court of Calvert county; of John I. Patison; and of John Ireland; which reports were severally referred to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. RICH, of Vermont, a report of a similar nature, made on another case yesterday, was reconsidered, and referred to the same Committee.

Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, from the Committee of Accounts, presented a report, as required by the order of the House, on the manner in which the printing of the House is executed, exculpating equally the Clerk and Contractor from blame. After some conversation, this report was laid on the table.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Secretary for the Department of War be instructed to report to this House a list of those persons who have been added to the pension list since the report made to the House of Representatives, from that Department, bearing date May 28, 1813, designating the number of each pensioner as he stands on the roll of the respective districts or agencies, his rank or quality, and the amount of annual stipend at present allowed to each person.

Mr. T. intimated his reasons for requiring this information. A proposition was now before the House for giving a bounty in land to disbanded officers. It was fit that the House should know how many of those officers already stand on the pension list of the United States. A proposition was before the House, also, to extend for five years the pensions now allowed to sufferers by the late war. Mr. T. wished to know how many were those pensioners, and to what amount.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, of Virginia,
Resolved, That the Secretary of War be directed to report to this House a list of all the officers who held brevet rank in the Army of the United States, at the close of the late war, noting their respective lineal rank at the time at which their brevet rank was conferred on them; together with a list of all the officers of the present Army who now hold a brevet higher than their lineal rank, and of these the number and grade of all such officers as actually receive, in virtue of their brevet rank, greater pay or emolument than they would be otherwise entitled to by law.

On motion of Mr. T. M. NELSON, of Virginia, it was

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for extinguishing the Indian title to certain lands south of Green river, in the State of Kentucky, which were set apart by the State of Virginia for satisfying the claims of certain Revolutionary officers to military bounty land, or of making such other provision, in relation thereto, as justice may recommend.

Resolved, That the same committee also inquire into the expediency of providing by law for satisfying the claims of those Revolutionary officers who were entitled, in virtue of sundry resolutions and acts of the General Assembly of Virginia, to military bounty land, to be laid off on the northwest side of the river Ohio, between the rivers Miami and Scioto, (now part of the State of Ohio,) which claims remain unprovided for, in consequence of the quantity of arable land having proved insufficient therefor.

[This motion produced some debate. In the shape in which it was first offered by the mover, it proposed to declare the measure therein proposed to be "expedient." To this it was objected, that it was expedient to investigate before deciding; and the mover consented to put his motion in the shape of an inquiry into the expediency of the proposed measure, and in that form the motion was finally adopted. Objection was made to it in its new shape by Mr. PITKIN of Connecticut, and Mr. POINDEXTER of Mississippi, (and doubts were expressed by Mr. DESHA of Kentucky,) on the ground of a defect of power in the House to pass an act for extinguishing Indian titles; which was of itself an Executive, and not a Legislative act. To which objections, Mr. T. M. NELSON, Mr. BARBOUR, Mr. GARNETT, and Mr. MERCER of Virginia, replied, that inquiry only was proposed, and not the expression of any opinion; that the inquiry would embrace as well the powers of Congress as the expediency of the measure—both of which, they contended, were unquestionable.]

COMMUTATION OF SOLDIERS' PAY.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill for the commutation of soldiers' pay, the question was taken on agreeing to the amendment of detail, (being a substitute for the bill before the Committee,) proposed by Mr. CLAY; and decided affirmatively—96 gentlemen rising in its favor.

The amendment of Mr. CLAY being then open for amendment, was read over for that purpose.

Mr. T. M. NELSON having moved to fill the blank for the amount of commutation with $160, (or one dollar per acre,) the question was decided in the negative, by a majority of about 20 votes.

Mr. CLAIBORNE, of Tennessee, on the principle that, if the bill passed—to which, however, he was altogether opposed—the Government ought not to speculate on the soldier, by giving him less than its own price for the same article, moved to fill the blank with $320, (or two dollars per acre.) Negatively, ayes 25.

Mr. COBB, of Georgia, having moved to fill the blank with $120 (or seventy-five cents per acre,) it was decided in the negative, ayes 48.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, moved $130, and Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, $150; both of which were negatively.

Mr. CLAY then moved to fill the blank with the sum originally proposed by him, of $100, though he confessed he should have preferred one dollar per acre. He was under the impression, however, that the bill had a better chance to pass in this shape than with a higher sum, and it would yet produce much good.

On this question the House divided thus: For the motion 75, against it 78.

A second count being called, the vote stood thus: For the motion 84, against it 67.

The amount of commutation was therefore decided to stand at $100 for 160 acres.

The Committee proceeded in the consideration of the bill, and made thereto a variety of amendments, on which much desultory debate took place.

The question being stated, "Shall the Committee rise and report the bill?" Mr. WHITMAN, of Massachusetts, assigned the reasons which would induce him to oppose the bill.

On motion of Mr. SPENCER, of New York, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

FRIDAY, December 19.

Another member, to wit: from Delaware, WILLARD HALL, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. MERCER presented a petition of the representatives of the yearly meeting of the Religious Society of Friends, held in Baltimore, praying that further provisions may be made for the security of persons of color, who are free or entitled to freedom, at a given period, in the traffic of slaves from the Middle to the Southern States, which was referred to a select committee; and Messrs. MERCER, COMSTOCK, DARLINGTON, TER-

RIIL, and EDWARDS, were appointed the committee.

Mr. RHEA presented a petition of the General Assembly of the State of Tennessee, praying that the titles to lands in that State, derived from the State of North Carolina, previous to the cession of Tennessee to the United States, may be confirmed.—Referred to the committee appointed yesterday, on a resolution submitted by Mr. THOMAS M. NELSON, concerning the military bounty lands granted by the State of Virginia.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill in addition to the act, entitled "An act for the relief of John Thompson," which was read twice, and committed.

Mr. TAYLOR, from the Committee of Elections, made a report on the certificates and other credentials of members, which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

The House took up the proposition submitted yesterday by Mr. POINDEXTER, to amend the rules and orders of the House, and the same was concurred in; and Mr. POINDEXTER and Mr. CLAIBORNE were then added to the Committee on Private Land Claims, conformable to the said amendment.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, the following rule was adopted:

"The Speaker shall have power to admit persons to seats in the hall, during the sitting of the House, who belong to such Legislatures of foreign Governments as are in amity with the United States."

[There was some little debate on a proposition of Mr. H. NELSON, of Virginia, to amend this motion, so as to authorize the Speaker to admit on the floor any Representatives of the South American Provinces—that they might stand on the same footing in this respect as foreign Ministers. After the debate (or rather, conversation) referred to, in the course of which Mr. HARRISON protested against the introduction of extraneous matter into his proposition, the motion of Mr. NELSON was negatived.]

On motion of Mr. HARRISON, the order of the day for the House to resolve itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the report of the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message, as relates to roads, canals, and seminaries of learning, was postponed until the first Monday in January next.

On motion of Mr. MERRILL, the Secretary of War was instructed to furnish a statement, showing the names of the several persons to whom land warrants have issued, and extra pay been allowed, subsequent to the 3d of March, 1817, under the act, entitled "An act granting bounty in lands, and extra pay to certain Canadian volunteers," and the acts supplementary thereto, together with the names of the agents or attorneys, to whom said land warrants were delivered, and the money paid, particularly noting such, if any, as were, or are, connected with the public offices; and also to state, whether any, and if any, what information he may have received, relative to impositions practised on claimants, by persons pretending to be agents, authorized by the Government.

Mr. WENDOVER submitted the following, which was read and ordered to lie on the table for one day:

Resolved, That the standing rules of this House be so amended that not more than — bills shall be committed to the same Committee of the whole House; and that such bills shall be analogous in their nature; which analogy shall be determined by the Speaker.

On motion of Mr. CAMPBELL, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of allowing further time for the officers and soldiers of the Virginia line, on Continental establishment, their heirs or assigns, entitled to bounty lands within the tract reserved by the State of Virginia, between the little Miami and Sciota rivers, to complete their locations, with leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Messrs. CAMPBELL, GARNETT, and SMYTH, of Virginia, were appointed the said committee.

On motion of Mr. HERBERT, the Secretary of the Treasury was directed to lay before this House a statement of the amount of receipts into the Treasury from imposts, internal taxes, and other sources of revenue within the District of Columbia, specifying the sum received in each year, since the assumption of the jurisdiction by Congress in 1801; also a statement of the amount of registered tonnage, employed in the carriage of goods, wares, and merchandise, in the foreign and coasting trade of the District.

On motion of Mr. SILSBEE, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the laws making appropriations for the establishment of custom-houses, which are now confined to principal districts, as to authorize the application of such appropriations as have already been, or may hereafter be, made to any district within the United States, where the Secretary of the Treasury shall think such establishments will best promote the public interest.

The House having again resolved itself into a Committee on the bill for the commutation of soldiers' bounty lands, some further discussion on amendments to it took place, in which Messrs. FORSYTH, POINDEXTER, CLAY, and ROBERTSON, of Kentucky, bore part; when the Committee rose, and reported the amendments to the bill; which were ordered to lie on the table, and to be printed for the more easily understanding thereof by the members before called upon to give a final vote on them.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter," was read twice, and committed.

The bill for the relief of Noah Miller, passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the surviving soldiers of the Revolutionary war,

Mr. LINN, of New Jersey, moved to strike out the word "war" in the bill, which makes the provisions of the bill applicable to all persons who served for any time in the Revolutionary war, and to insert, in lieu thereof, "Army of the United States," so as to confine the bill to the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary army. As the bill at present stood, Mr. L. said nearly every person in the United States of sufficient age, and in a state of indigence, would be embraced in it; for few of them but had been in some grade, and at some time or other, in the service.

At the suggestion of Mr. BLOOMFIELD, of New Jersey, this motion was withdrawn for the present.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD delivered his impressions in respect to the operation and scope of this bill. He made a statement to show what were his views of the probable number of applicants under this bill, if it should pass; and the annual amount of the expenditure it would occasion. The Jersey brigade, he said, consisted, during the war, of four regiments; there were forty officers to each regiment, making in the whole one hundred and sixty. On the 4th of July last, as he was enabled from personal knowledge to state, there were living but twenty of those officers, being precisely one-eighth of the whole number. Taking this fact for his guide, as the proportion of survivors, he said, there were in the Continental army sixty-eight battalions, of whom about seventeen thousand men were killed or died in service; and at the close of the war, it was a well known fact, the battalions did not average more in each than two hundred and fifty; making in the whole seventeen thousand men—of whom, say about one-tenth (being generally not of as regular habits as the officers) were living; that is, seventeen thousand. Estimating the proportion of applicants for the pension at one-sixth, would make three hundred and forty. The full pay of the Revolution, six and two-thirds dollars per month to each, of these, would amount to $2,295 per month. Of the officers, the whole original number he estimated at two thousand seven hundred and twenty; of whom, supposing one-eighth to have survived, as in the instance of the Jersey brigade, there were now living about one thousand three hundred and forty. Of this number, he supposed one-tenth of the whole would become applicants for pensions—say thirty-four; at the full subaltern Revolutionary pay of seventeen dollars per month, their pensions would amount to $578 per month. The monthly pension for both officers and soldiers, on this estimate, would be $2,873, and the annual amount only $34,376—an amount which must daily decrease. But, instead of full pay pension, the bill, as it now stood, provided only for half pay. Would this House be satisfied, Mr. B. asked, with giving to these men, borne down with age and service, a pension of three and a third dollars a month during the small remainder of their lives, whilst they had given the soldiers of the late war (no disparagement to them) eight dollars per month? He hoped not; and therefore moved to amend the bill so as that the amount of pension should be for every officer seventeen dollars per month, and for every soldier eight.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, moved to amend the amendment, so as to make the pensions twenty and eight.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to without objection, after a few observations from Mr. COMSTOCK.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, suggested an amendment to the bill, going to make its phraseology more precise in regard to those to whom it should apply; because, as at present worded, it would entitle to a pension not only all who were in need of it, but those also who, though in affluence, were disabled by age or infirmity from procuring subsistence by manual labor.

Between Mr. COLSTON, of Virginia, and Mr. ORR, of Massachusetts, an amendment was moved to the bill, that every officer or soldier, who served in any manner during the Revolutionary war, and now surviving, should be entitled to the pension abovementioned—the one to twenty, the other to eight dollars per month.

On this motion a desultory debate arose, in which the following sentiments were expressed by the gentlemen to whose names they are subjoined.

Mr. COLSTON objected to the qualification of indigence, required by the bill, to entitle the surviving Revolutionary officer and soldier to the benefit of its provision. Let not the soldier, said he, by whose bravery and sufferings we are entitled to hold seats on this floor, be required to expose his poverty to the world, and exhibit the proof of it, to entitle him to relief. The incorporation of such a provision in the bill he considered as degrading to the House. In what light was this bill to be regarded? Was it to be considered as an act of justice? It was less than justice, having suffered these meritorious men to have remained for years unrewarded, to offer to the poor remains of them the right to a pension during life, clogged with such conditions. As an act of beneficence, he should be ashamed to hear it supported on this floor. On this subject, Mr. C. said he hoped a liberal spirit would prevail; and that, for the short remnant of their lives a pension would be given to all who survived of the soldiers of the Revolution.

Mr. ORR accorded fully in the sentiment of Mr. COLSTON. On the first perusal of the bill, he was struck with the thought, what must be the feelings of the high-minded officer of the Revolution, compelled to produce in open court the proofs of his own indigence; and he hoped the House would amend that part of the bill.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, avowed his high respect for the survivors of the Revolution, and his sincere desire to contribute to their comfort in old age. But, he said, the amendment now proposed went too far, because it would embrace every one who had shouldered a musket, even for an hour, during the Revolutionary war. As to those who had seen serious service, so far from having claim to the meed of liberality, the amendment would be but a measure of justice, as no bounty had been accorded to them. Persons, however, covered with scars and borne down by length of service in those days, ought not be confounded with those who had been called out for an hour or a day. Some of the militia, he thought, were as well entitled to this pension as any regulars, of whom the Jersey militia might be particularly mentioned. But he wished to have the operation of the bill limited to such as should have served six months or more.

Mr. SOUTHARD, of New Jersey, did not like the word "shall," as applied to the receipt of pensions: "shall receive pensions," he said was making the bill compulsory. Some of the survivors, he said were wealthy; towards them he felt gratitude for the services they had rendered their country; but he would not extend to them the same measure as to the indigent and the afflicted. Some of those who survive, the war itself had made rich—the wealth of some of them was almost unbounded, and, in some cases, he was sorry to say, it was acquired by speculating on the soldiers' claims. Such characters he was not in favor of putting on the pension list of the United States. Under the amendment proposed, said Mr. S., there are many gentlemen in my view, who would become pensioners—perhaps myself among them, if I chose to be compelled to take one. There were many men on this floor, he believed, who deserved the gratitude of the country, but who would not accept a pension at its hands.

Mr. SMITH, of Maryland, said, that, in draughting the bill, the select committee had conformed it pretty much to the words of the message; and he believed it was their desire to confine it to the survivors of the army of the Revolution. Except one indeed, the committee who reported the bill was composed entirely of officers of the Revolution, and would have felt a delicacy in introducing a bill on the very liberal principles which some gentlemen had advocated. But if this House chose to extend the provisions of the bill to all survivors, he should not, for one, object. He might not, under the rules of the House, be permitted, as one interested, to vote on the question; nor should he vote on such a question—nor would he take the pension. But he should not object to the amendment, since there seemed to be a pretty general sentiment prevailing, that, if the House chose to be liberal, it should be to all alike. If he thought, however, that such an amendment would endanger the fate of the bill, he should certainly adhere to the bill as it originally stood.

Mr. BLOOMFIELD opposed the amendment, as it might prejudice the fate of the bill, the provisions of which he thought were already sufficiently comprehensive. If the Message of the President had contained not a word on the subject, he should have considered it equally his duty to agitate this question. He concluded a number of other observations, opposing a proposed postponement, by saying, he hoped to have the satisfaction of seeing this bill pass the House before the holidays.

No question was taken on the amendment, when the Committee agreed to rise and report progress, and obtained leave to sit again; and the House adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, December 22.

Another member to wit: from Pennsylvania, ALEXANDER OGLE, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. MASON, of Massachusetts, presented petitions from manufacturers of cotton and woollen goods, in Waltham, Dedham, Brunswick, Lancaster, and West Boylston, in the State of Massachusetts, praying that further aid and encouragement, may be granted to domestic manufactures.

Mr. STORRS presented a similar petition from sundry inhabitants of Oneida county, in the State of New York.

Mr. WESTERLO, Mr. SOUTHARD, Mr. HALL, of Delaware, and Mr. BASSETT, respectively presented petitions from sundry manufacturers of iron, praying that additional duties may be imposed on pig iron, bar iron, and castings, imported into the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures.

Mr. HOPKINSON presented a petition of the surviving officers of the Pennsylvania line of the Revolutionary Army, praying that the whole amount of the half pay, secured to the officers of the said army, by a resolution of Congress, may be granted to them, with a deduction of the commutation thereof, for five years full pay.—Referred to the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message, as relates to the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army.

Mr. HOPKINSON, also presented a petition of the Chamber of Commerce, of the city of Philadelphia, praying for the establishment of an uniform system of bankruptcy.—Referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill for that purpose.

Mr. COBB, from the committee appointed to inquire into the claims of certain detachments of the militia of Georgia, for services performed in the years 1793, and 1794, made a detailed report, which was read; when Mr. C. reported a bill for the payment of certain militia claims, of the State of Georgia, which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion by Mr. McCox, of Virginia,

Resolved, That the Committee on Public Lands be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the price at which the public land shall be sold hereafter.

On this question there was a division; the resolution was agreed to by a majority of twenty or thirty votes.

On motion by Mr. BASSETT, of Virginia,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be required to communicate to this House the measure taken, if any, to give effect to the act passed on the 26th February, 1811, for the establishment of Navy hospitals; if nothing has been done, to show the cause why the statute has been neglected, and whether it be necessary to repeal the same.

On motion of Mr. PORTER, of New York, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing by law the compensation of the Marshal of the northern district of the State of New York.

A letter was received from the Secretary of State, in reply to a resolution of this House of the 16th, requesting copies of certain accounts of M. M. Noah, stating, that the accounts therein referred to had been transmitted to this House on the 8th instant.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire whether the moneys deposited, from time to time, in the district court of the United States for the district of New York, have been faithfully applied, and that said committee be invested with power to send for persons and papers.

The bill for the relief of Noah Miller was read a third time, and passed.

EXPATRIATION.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the select committee to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill providing the manner in which the right of citizenship may be relinquished.

[The bill proposes to provide that when any citizen, by application in writing to the district court of any district of the United States, in open court, and there to be recorded, shall declare that he relinquishes the character of a citizen, and means to depart out of the United States, he shall be thenceforth considered as having exercised the right of expatriation, and as being no longer a citizen of the United States; that such person shall be held as an alien forever after, and shall not resume the rights of citizenship without going through the same process of naturalization as other citizens.]

AMERICAN MANUFACTURES.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Commerce and Manufactures be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for clothing the Army and Navy of the United States exclusively in American manufactures.

In offering this motion, Mr. J. said it would not be proper for him to detail the facts, or advance the reasoning which led him to the conclusion that the measure he proposed to inquire into was expedient. But he would say that he should not have thought of introducing this resolution, if he did not believe the cloth of American manufacture could be obtained at a reasonable rate. One of the objections to making a provision by law such as was contemplated, and the only one which appeared to him to have any force, was that, by destroying the competition between domestic and foreign articles, the Government would be obliged to pay higher for the same articles than they now do; but it would be seen by gentlemen that such augmentation could only be momentary; and, Mr. J. said, the competition of the manufacturers among themselves would be so great, he had no doubt, as to give the article to the Government at the lowest possible price. The practice of the War Department, already, was to give a preference to the domestic fabric, but that preference was given with reference to the cost of the article; a system which produced not only uncertainty, because of the fluctuating state of the foreign market, but uncertainty, consequently, to the calculations of the manufacturer. In relation to the Navy, Mr. J. said, he did not know that his project was practicable; if it was, it would be necessary perhaps to give a discretionary power on this head to the commanders, when on foreign stations. But he hoped no objection would be made to an inquiry on the subject, and that the committee would favor the House with an early report.

The motion was agreed to.

ARMY AND FORTIFICATIONS.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT of the UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives, of the 11th of this month, requesting to be informed of the present strength of the Army of the United States, its distribution among the several military posts, which it is designed to protect, and its competency to preserve and defend the fortifications among which it is distributed, and to aid in constructing such other military works, if any, as it may be deemed proper to erect, for the more effectual security of the United States, and of the Territories thereof; I now transmit a report from the Secretary of War, which contains the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 22, 1817.

In compliance with the resolution of the House of Representatives, requesting the President of the United States "to cause to be laid before the House of Representatives a return of the present strength of the Army of the United States, with the distribution thereof among the several military posts which it is designed to protect, together with any information which he may be able to afford respecting the competency of such force to preserve and defend the fortifications, amongst which it is distributed, and to aid in constructing, and to defend such other military works, if any, as it may be in the contemplation of the Government to erect, for the more effectual security of the United States, and of the several Territories thereof;" the Secretary of War has the honor to make a return of the present strength of the Army of the United States, with the distribution thereof among the several military posts.

The Military Establishment, as it now stands, is sufficiently extensive to keep the fortifications in a state of preservation, but is wholly inadequate to defend them against a regular attack by a force of sufficient strength and skill. To garrison the forts on the maritime frontier alone would require, according to the best information and estimates of this Department, more than thrice our present number, to repel the assaults of such a force. The portion of the army stationed in the neighborhood of fortifications now erecting, are employed to aid in constructing them; but only an inconsiderable number has yet been so engaged, owing to its dispersed situation. Though not immediately comprehended in the resolution of the House, it is but justice to the army to observe, that it has been employed to a considerable extent, the last year, in the construction of roads, arsenals, and other public works connected with the defence of the country.

The existing fortifications are thought to be wholly insufficient in the event of a future war. As the declaration of war is the act of the whole community, justice, honor, and humanity require that every portion of the country should, as far as possible, be protected against its ravages. This is among the most sacred duties of the Government; and, impressed with its importance, a board of the most skillful officers in our service has been constituted, to examine the whole line of our frontier, and to determine on the position and extent of works that may be necessary to the defence of the country. This great work is not yet completed; and in its present state it is impossible to speak with any precision as to the extent to which our fortifications ought to be carried. The soldiers will be able to render important aid in constructing the works that may be determined on, but, "from the composition of the army," they can only come in aid of regular and professed workmen.

J. C. CALHOUN.

[The detailed and particular statement accompanying the report from the Adjutant General's office, states the actual number of the present Peace Establishment at 8,221, including officers.]

The report was ordered to lie on the table.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY SOLDIERS.

The remainder of this day's sitting was spent in Committee of the Whole, on the bill concerning the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution. There was much debate, occasionally eloquent, but generally desultory, on amendments proposed to the bill, but involving also its principles.

Mr. STROTHER said, that he had not intended to trouble the House with any observations upon the passage of this bill; but he could not remain silent, when, by the proposed amendment, a feature was endeavored to be incorporated into it, which, to him, appeared to narrow the operation of the bill, and to strip it, at least, of one moiety of its merit. Is it just, or is it politic, he asked, to discriminate between the Continental line and the State troops, and the militia? What is the professed object of the bill? To provide for the indigent soldiers of the Revolution. What is the feeling or sentiment from which it springs? He said he had hailed the introduction of this bill as an auspicious circumstance—as a gratifying evidence of the re-connexion of public feeling with the principles of the Revolution. If gratitude be the feeling or sentiment from which this bill springs, by what principle would you limit and confine it to the Continental line? Is the reason to be found in the bright page of your Revolutionary history, or in what celebrated system of ethics will you find its justification? If, said he, you look to the magnitude of the boon conferred, how awful is the debt of gratitude! Mark this mighty empire arising into existence from peril and from blood, and then sit down, if you can, and, by cool arithmetical calculation, draw a line of discrimination between those who gratuitously bestowed upon you that freedom and that prosperity you now enjoy. But why, said he, shall the militia be excluded the nation's bounty? Did they not assist in the conflict? Did they not, half armed and undisciplined, meet the invading foe, and assist in repelling him from your shores? The battle ground of Guilford speaks their eulogium; Bunker's Hill is the imperishable monument of their valor. If motive gives character to action, the indigent militiaman has the highest claim to the interposition of this Government. That love of liberty and country, which elevates man to his highest destiny, was the sole emulating principle which gave courage to their hearts, and strength to their arms, in the hour of battle. Here were motives as pure, and achievements as brilliant, as illustrate the proudest nations of antiquity. Sir, said Mr. S., it is with the deepest regret that I am driven to the comparison. I would ask that hand to perish, that would snatch one leaf from that laurel that adorns the brow of the Revolutionary army; but it must be admitted that the Continental army, had a mixed and compound motive; the holy flame that then electrified the country no doubt burnt bright in their bosoms; but they were surrounded by all the pride, pomp, and circumstance of glorious war; ambition had his prize in view, and avarice his reward. But why shall this invidious distinction be drawn in our legislative provisions? Let national pride, let national gratitude, obliterate it forever. Length of service, said he, is a criterion of merit equally fallacious and unjust. With the best possible disposition to render services, unfavorable circumstances may doom one soldier to waste his energies in inglorious ease, whilst others, favored by more auspicious fortune, may, within a comparatively short period, have frequently been led to battle, and, by their personal prowess, have contributed to the emancipation of their country. Within the experience of many members of this Committee, these facts have occurred, and they are within the observation of all; shall we, then, he asked, with these facts ringing in our ears, and occurring recently before our eyes, admit a principle so deceptive and so inequitable? Sir, said Mr. S., I had viewed this bill in a different light; I had considered it emanating from feelings of mingled respect and sympathy; as a homage paid to that stoic fortitude and heroic courage that reclaimed a hemisphere from slavery; as a tribute of respect to sages who conceived and framed a Government, embracing in its gigantic arms an entire continent, protecting its inhabitants in the enjoyment of freedom and happiness. This House, said he, cannot more appropriately evince these feelings than by rejecting the proposed amendment. All who contributed to build up our magnificent political fabric, should be embraced in the wide circle of gratitude. Permit not him, who, in the pride of vigor and of youth, wasted his health and shed his blood in freedom's cause, with desponding heart and palsied limbs to totter from door to door, bowing his yet untamed soul to melt the frozen bosom of reluctant charity ! No, sir, he said, the nation should seek out these noble ruins of that splendid period, and spread its charity around to warm and cheer them into a forgetfulness of their wrongs and their sorrows, in the evening of their days. Mr. S. concluded by remarking, that he flattered himself the amendment would not obtain. The object of the bill seems to connect gratitude and charity, service and distress. The beams of national charity should not be concentrated on the head of the enlisted soldier; the beams of national beneficence should equally visit the domicile of the militiaman, and convey comfort to his fireside.

MESSRS. BLOOMFIELD, WALKER, GARNETT, HARRISON, COMSTOCK, PALMER, LIVERMORE, TRIMBLE, and RHEA, successively joined in the debate.

The principal question before the Committee of the Whole was on the amendment proposed by General HARRISON; which was to strike out the two first sections of the present bill, and insert, in lieu thereof, other sections, providing that every Revolutionary officer and soldier, who formed a part of the Military Establishment of the United States at the close of the war, or who previously thereto served not less than three years, and received an honorable discharge, shall receive a pension; if an officer, of half pay; if a private, of five dollars per month; but no officer's pension to exceed the half pay of a lieutenant colonel, &c.

The question on this motion was not taken before the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, December 23.

Mr. SERGEANT presented a petition of the Board of Managers of the American Bible Society, praying that all letters and packets sent to, or from their president, secretaries, and treasurer, on the business of the Society, may be sent free of postage, under such regulations as Congress may think proper to impose; which was referred to a select committee; and Mr. SERGEANT, Mr. BRYAN, Mr. MERCER, Mr. TAYLOR, and Mr. MORTON, were appointed the committee.

Mr. SERGEANT also presented a petition of the Board of Managers of the Philadelphia Bible Society, praying that the duties imposed on stereotype plates, already imported into the United States, and designed for the printing of the Holy Scriptures, may be remitted; that all duties incurred on the importation of the said Scriptures, printed in foreign languages for gratuitous distribution, may also be remitted, and that inspired writings in foreign languages, hereafter imported, may be imported free of duty.—Referred to the committee last appointed.

On motion of Mr. FLOYD, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of extending the privilege of franking to one person in each of the States and Territories of the United States, who shall be appointed by the Governor or Legislature thereof, for the purpose of distributing the vaccine matter, within such State or Territory; and that they have leave to report by bill or otherwise; and Mr. FLOYD, Mr. ABBOTT, and Mr. SEYBERT, were appointed the committee.

Mr. ROBERTSON made a report on the letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, concerning the islands in the rivers passing through the public lands; which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient, in this particular, to alter the law regulating the surveys of the public lands.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for appointing justices or conservators of the peace, or other magistrates, authorized to enforce the execution of the laws of the United States.

On motion of Mr. HERRICK, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for increasing the compensation paid to jurors and witnesses, summoned to attend the several courts of the United States.

JUDICIAL RECORDS.

Mr. HUGH NELSON from the Committee on the Judiciary, who were instructed to inquire whether any, and if any, what legal provisions are necessary to prescribe the effect which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings of each State, shall have in the courts of every other State, made a report thereon, which was read; when, Mr. N. reported a bill to prescribe the effect which certain records and judicial proceedings of the courts of each State, shall have in every other State of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

That, upon inquiry, it is ascertained that various and contradictory decisions have been made upon the construction of the act of Congress entitled "An act to prescribe the mode in which the public acts, records, and judicial proceedings, in each State, shall be authenticated so as to take effect in every other State," which was passed the 26th May, 1790. In some of the courts it has been decided that the records of judgments coming from other States authenticated in the manner prescribed in the act are upon the same footing as foreign judgments; that they are merely prima facie evidence of the debt or demand, which evidence may be inquired into and rebutted by extraneous proof; and, finally, that the original cause of action may be again investigated. In other courts, it has been decided that such records are conclusive evidence of the debt, and cannot be impeached but upon some ground or fact occurring after the rendition of the judgment.

Your committee are of opinion that Congress has not yet executed the power given by the Constitution of prescribing the effect which such records shall have. At all events, so much doubt rests upon the question, that, in the opinion of your committee, it is highly expedient that Congress should interpose by a law which will produce uniformity in the decisions throughout the Union, and which, by the establishment of a fixed and certain rule, will give confidence and security to commercial men in every part of the United States. They have therefore prepared a bill, which is herewith presented.

INDEMNITY FOR SLAVES.

Mr. WILLIAMS, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the report of the Secretary of State on the petitions of Antoine Bienvenu, Peter Lacoste, and Jacques Villeré, citizens of Louisiana, made to the House the following report; which was concurred in by the House:

That the petitions and accompanying documents were, by a resolution of the 29th of January last, referred to the Secretary of State; that the Secretary of State has submitted to the House a report, (hereto annexed,) which the committee beg leave to adopt as a part of their report.

The Committee of Claims would at any time undertake with great diffidence to discuss principles of national law, or settle questions of conventional right. But at this time it would, in their opinion, be peculiarly in delicate, if not premature, for Congress to adopt any measure whatever. It would seem to them more correct that the subject of the petitions should await the result of a negotiation now pending between the Governments of the United States and Great Britain. They therefore recommend to the House the following resolution:

Resolved, That the petitioners have leave to withdraw their petitions and documents.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 12, 1817.

The Secretary of State, to whom, by a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 29th of January last, were referred the petitions of Antoine Bienvenu, Peter Lacoste, and Jacques Villeré, citizens of Louisiana, has the honor of submitting the following report:

The petitioners complain that when the British forces retreated from the island of Orleans, at the close of the late war, they carried away a considerable number of slaves belonging to them; the restoration of which was, after the ratification of the treaty of peace, demanded by General Jackson, conformably to the first article of that treaty, of the British commanding officer, General Lambert, and by him refused; and they apply to Congress for indemnity for the loss of their property.

Subsequently to the reference of these petitions, a Message from the President to the Senate of the United States was, on the 7th of February last, transmitted, to that body, with all the documents then in the possession of this Department relating to the subject of these petitions; a printed copy of that Message and of those documents is herewith transmitted, which it is respectfully requested may be received as part of this report. By them it will be seen that a different construction has been given by the British Government to that part of the first article of the Treaty of Ghent which relates to the restitution of slaves captured during the war, from that contended for by this Government. That, according to their construction, the British Government have not considered themselves bound to make restitution of any of the slaves or other property thus taken and carried away; and that the difference of opinion between the two Governments remaining, after all the amicable discussion between them of which the subject was susceptible, a proposal was made, on the part of the United States, on the 17th of September, 1816, that the question should be referred to the arbitration of some friendly Power. To this proposal no answer from the British Government has yet been received. Their attention to it was again invited by the late Minister of the United States in England, before he left London, and has been urged anew in the instructions to his successor.

All which is respectfully submitted.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

THE CASE OF MR. MEADE.

Mr. TRIMBLE, of Kentucky, offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before the House any information he may be able to communicate relative to the impressment and detention of Richard Cowles Meade, a citizen of the United States.

Mr. T. said that, having offered the resolution, it might be expected that he would give some explanation of the case to which it alludes. He had a right to presume that every member of the House had heard of the confinement of Mr. Meade. More than three years ago that gentleman had been incarcerated in a Spanish dungeon, where he had ever since remained. It was within his (Mr. T.'s) recollection, that many persons had expected that the last Congress would have caused an inquiry to be made into the subject; but, since that period, the case had assumed a new character, of most extraordinary complexion. It was well known, he said, that Mr. Meade is a citizen of the United States, and he believed, was, at one time, an accredited Consul, resident in some part of the Spanish dominions. Either character ought to have protected him from violence and outrage. But, unfortunately for him, they did not. The causes which produced his confinement were unknown to Mr. T.—they were probably buried in the vaults of the Inquisition. That, however, was of little consequence, if the facts which he was about to state were true; and that they are true was evinced, he said, by a document which he held in his hand, and which, he said, struck the mind with as much force as if it was marked with the characters of official certainty. I am prepared, said he, to admit, that if a citizen of the United States shall violate the penal or criminal code of any other country, he must submit to the punishment which may be inflicted on him; but such is not the case of Mr. Meade. It was not contended, he said, that the person in question had violated the letter or spirit of any part of the penal or criminal code of Spain—and, on the contrary, the document which he held in his hand afforded the highest evidence that there was no cause of complaint against him. Upon some urgent and vigorous remonstrances being made on this subject by our Minister, Mr. Erving, a public notorious royal order was issued. Mark me, sir, said he—a public notorious royal order, announcing to Spain, to America, and the whole world, that there was no cause for the detention of Mr. Meade, and directing his immediate releasement. How the aching heart of Mr. Meade must have throbbed and swelled, cheered with the prospect of leaving in a few hours his loathsome, pestilential dungeon, to breathe once more the free and wholesome air! How it must have sunk and died within him, when the doors of his "prison house" were unbarred by a meagre minion, who had come skulking through the vaults of those abodes of death, with another secret order. Mark me again, sir—another secret order issued at the same time, under the same royal signature, commanding his keeper to hold the prisoner at his peril. Yes, sir, one order, public and notorious for his releasement, and another secret order for confinement, of the same date, and under the same royal signature. If these facts be true, the case stands without a parallel in ancient or modern times. Even the case of Czerney George has no similitude; he was a monster, executed by the Turk, because he had, in cold blood, plunged his sabre through the heart of his own father. Whereas Mr. Meade is acknowledged to be an innocent victim, suffering under royal displeasure. I will not attempt, said Mr. T., to paint the horrors of a Spanish dungeon, or the sickenings of hope at protracted confinement. It is not my wish to excite public feeling, and I utterly disclaim all intention of connecting this subject with other questions, now under discussion, or which may fall under discussion, between this Government and Spain. Mr. T. averred also that he had entire confidence in the late and present Executive heads of the Government, and had no doubt that everything which could be done had been done in behalf of Mr. Meade. But he held it the duty of this House to inquire into this (he would again call it) extraordinary case, and, if the facts and circumstances shall require it, make such expression of its opinion as will add weight and force to future Executive exertions. If the case were as well-founded rumor told, he for one was ready to volunteer his arm in defence of Mr. Meade, and breast the storm, unfearing consequences. For, said he, while I have the honor of a seat in this House no lawless despot shall lay an angry finger on a fellow-citizen of mine, without the hazard of bringing that finger to the block. He was one of those, he said, who were willing to believe that we ought not at this time uselessly to embroil ourselves with any foreign Power; and he was thoroughly satisfied that it is our best and wisest policy to husband our resources, our men, and our means, to meet the coming conflict with the only nation that dare strike us upon the land or on the water—the only nation that can send us a Hannibal, or whom we shall revisit with a Scipio—that nation who has already sacked our infant Rome, and whose proud Carthage we shall one day humble in the dust, and sweep with the besom of retributive desolation. But, said he, there are no present circumstances, or looked for events, that ought to incline us to harden our ears, that we may not hear the calls of a suffering citizen, imploring our protection. Solon, I think it was, upon being asked, "What form of Government is best?" replied, "That form in which the smallest insult offered to the meanest citizen is considered an injury to the whole community." Could a better maxim be adopted in a Government like ours? Is there anything which so exactly accords with the principles of our Constitution? This, it is true, is but a single instance of individual oppression; but the outrage done to the personal rights of the victim; the infraction of national law; and the affront, the insult offered to our Government, is exactly the same as if half a million had been incarcerated; for he held that our system of Government is the true poetic chain, which links us together as a band of brothers—and

"If from that chain a single link you strike,

"Ten, or ten thousand, break the chain alike."

We are bound, sir, said Mr. T., under our Constitution, to protect the life, liberty, and property of every citizen of our country. But where may he claim that protection? Or rather, where shall his right to claim it cease? Is it confined to the limits of the Union? or does it not extend to the remotest region of the globe, which is visited by our people? May the citizen claim it against the savages of the Western wilds, and is he not entitled to it among the still more lawless chieftains of a decaying, perishing, and ruined monarchy? It is not in this land of liberty that the citizen need call for protection; here it comes, as it were, unbidden, to encompass him about; but when oppression falls upon him in a foreign land, among strangers, friendless and unprotected, his supplicating voice should not be heard in vain; for everything which is obligatory in the social compact, or honorable in humanity, calls for and commands your protection, as if he stood upon the sacred soil that gave him birth. Who of us, said Mr. T., in the condition of Mr. Meade, would not ask this inquiry of this House? Which of us will refuse it? for the honor of my country I hope there is not one.

The motion of Mr. T. was agreed to without opposition or further debate.

REVOLUTIONARY SURVIVORS.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill concerning the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary war—

Mr. FORSYTH regretted that the amendments proposed by the gentleman from Ohio had not been printed, as the object he had in view was not understood by the Committee. Every gentleman who had discussed the subject since they were introduced appeared to think it was proposed to extend the provisions of the bill to all the surviving officers of the Revolutionary army. This was not the case. The proposition is to change the application of the principle, and, to a certain extent, to enlarge the provision of relief; but the principle of the bill and the amendments were essentially the same. Both contemplated relief to indigence only. If he understood the proposition, (and if he did not he hoped to be corrected) the alterations proposed were: To render it unnecessary for the persons claiming the benefit of the act to establish the fact of their poverty by proof: every indigent officer and soldier who asked, as such, were to receive the pension offered by the Government on the production of the evidence of service during the Revolutionary war; it was left to his own honor to determine how far his poverty entitled him to the bounty of Government: To graduate the amount of pension by the rank of the officer, clogged with the limitation of the original bill, that no pension should exceed the half pay of a lieutenant colonel: To give to every Revolutionary officer in the service of the United States since the peace of 1783, and who has been disbanded, pay according to the rank he last held in the Army. Mr. F. was friendly to the first part of this proposition; he did not think that it was either ridiculous or disgraceful for an individual to confess his indigence, and accept a support from the Government of this country; but he was anxious to save those who ought to be relieved from the humiliating necessity of searching for evidence of the precise quantum of their property, or producing surgeons' certificates of the state of their bodily strength. He was aware that some impositions would be practised, but he preferred that the Government should lose a few hundred dollars to the risk of depriving a single suffering officer or soldier of the pittance proposed to be allowed, from the operation of even a false delicacy. As, however, the original bill, by mere verbal modification, would produce the same end, he should vote against the amendment proposed; because of its connexion with the other alteration he deemed inadmissible. The graduation of the pay according to rank was a work of unnecessary detail; it could make the limitation but a few dollars difference to the highest rank, and, Heaven knows, twenty dollars per month was but a poor subsistence for any man who had ever been accustomed to live like an officer. Besides, the Committee were relieving the wants of the suffering, not regulating the emoluments of rank; and he was confident no general officer would regret that, after being reduced to the half pay of a lieutenant colonel, an ensign should have the same allowance that was given to himself. Mr. F. was at a loss to understand the ground upon which the last proposition was defended; upon what principle the rank of an officer of the Army subsequent to 1783 was to be considered as entitling him to the emoluments given to those of the same rank prior to that period. If a discrimination was made, it ought to be in favor of those who never had been subsequently employed. Those retained in service, or subsequently reappointed, had, to a certain extent, enjoyed the bounty of the Government: instead of deserving more, they were, on that account, entitled to less than their fellow officers, who have not experienced the same good fortune. Mr. F. was, therefore, opposed to the proposed change. With the great majority of the House, he was disposed, after the verbal modification to which he had alluded should be made, to vote for the bill without scanning too curiously the motives of his conduct. It was enough for him to know, that there were men, the recollection of whose services always inspired the most grateful emotions, in want, to desire to relieve them. So far as it could be done without the violation of principle, or the establishment of a dangerous precedent, if his voice could effect it, it should be done. He must protest, however, against the doctrine advanced by several gentlemen, that these individuals had claims upon the justice of the country for pecuniary assistance. An honorable gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. TRIMBLE,) and the honorable gentleman from the State of Maryland, (Mr. SMITH,) had told the Committee that some remuneration was due, since the commutation of five years' full pay for the promised half-pay for life was forced upon the officers at the close of the war. The preamble of the resolution of Congress offering this alternative declares that the offer was made at the request of the Army—a boon granted to their solicitation, and for the reasons stated in their petition to that body. At this day it is too late to complain of their choice. The Government, according to its ability, dealt with them as with all its creditors, and distinction cannot be made in their favor without injustice to all those to whom it was indebted. It is unfortunately true, that before the United States could redeem its moneyed obligation, the original claimants had parted with their right; and, although the Treasury paid every shilling in the pound, principal and interest, those who earned did not receive the allowance. The time was when a just discrimination in their favor might have been; but the opportunity was sacrificed to the chimerical notion of laying deep and broad the foundation of the public credit, by securing immense wealth to those who had speculated upon the supposed public insolvency. The obligation of money was paid to those to whom the right of receiving it was assigned. That improvidence, or necessity, or want of just confidence in the resources of the country, induced the original holders to part with their demands, is to be deeply regretted; but the fault was not ours, and it is not in our power to remedy it. We owe the Revolutionary officers no debt. Mr. F. said, he spoke not of the moral obligation for the achievement of independence and the security of public and individual liberty. The benefits which they had bestowed were infinite, and no pecuniary recompense could discharge the vast amount. But even here a suitable recompense had been afforded. Those who resisted the invasion of the rights of the people, and secured their enjoyment, who established the independence of their country, have enjoyed, in common with their fellow-citizens, those inestimable blessings. Nay, more, they have been, at all times, the peculiar objects of the patronage of the Government, and of the people's love. Revolutionary service is the passport to office and to the confidence of their fellow-citizens. There are some instances of a contrary character, but they are only exceptions to a general rule, arising from some unfortunate political opinions, or from the character of the individual. Of the truth of this statement, a reference might be made to the history of the public offices in the General Government. Even under his eye there were striking examples of it. What gave to the honorable chairman who reported the bill (Mr. BLOOMFIELD) the undeviating support of his fellow-citizens in New Jersey; that raised him from office to office, until he was elected to the Executive Chair, and thence as their Representative in this Hall? Was it his pure integrity, his good sense, his upright character, and undeviating political consistency? There were many men in New Jersey, who, in all these qualities, might hope to equal him; but to all these he added the important requisite of Revolutionary service. The other honorable member of the committee, who was the zealous advocate of the bill, (Mr. SMITH)—what had secured to him, for so many years, the confidence of the State of Maryland, or of the district in which he lives? He served during the Revolutionary war. Living in a city, Mr. F. would not call it factious, but certainly distinguished by the violence of its political feelings, what has at all times enabled him, if not to satisfy its expectations, at least to escape the consequences of its resentment? Is it his powerful intellect and extensive commercial information; his industry and his zeal? In all these he has formidable competitors. It is because, even when filled with resentment at a portion of his political conduct, they could not consider his claims for their suffrages without the glorious defence of Mud Fort rising unbidden to their view. Every State government would furnish similar illustrations. Revolutionary officers and soldiers gave steadiness to the movements of the Legislative bodies, added wisdom and dignity to the Judiciary, and nerved the arm of Executive power. Even those who have partaken of none of these advantages, who are old and helpless, steeped to the lips in poverty, have they not the consoling, the glorious reflection, that their toils and their sufferings are the causes of the prosperity which is smiling around them? Where is the selfish reptile, who, under such circumstances, will not exclaim, "I am amply rewarded!" This is not the cry of fond enthusiasm, but the dictate of sober reason. The severest mortal agony is amply repaid by the consciousness of having raised our country to its elevated rank—of having contributed to the felicity of millions of the human race.

The debate continued on the main subject and on the proposed amendment of Mr. HARRISON. In this debate Messrs. BLOOMFIELD, S. SMITH, HARRISON, COLSTON, BALDWIN, CLAGETT, HOPKINSON, RHEA, ROSS, and INGHAM, bore part.

The amendment proposed by Mr. HARRISON, was ultimately rejected; as also was a previous question for the rising of the Committee, in order to postpone the subject.

The Committee then went on further to amend the bill, on suggestion of various members. In the proposition and discussion of these amendments, Messrs. PETER, BLOOMFIELD, LIVERMORE, PARRIS, RHEA, BENNETT, BEECHER, HARRISON, TERRY, FORSYTH, SMITH of North Carolina, TAYLOR of New York, TALLMADGE, WHITMAN, CLAGETT, PALMER, and STORER, took part.

Among the successful motions was one by Mr. PARRIS, to include the "officers and mariners who served in the Navy of either of the States, or of the United States," thus placing the Revolutionary officers of the Navy on the same footing as those of the Army.

The Committee of the Whole rose, about four o'clock, and reported the bill as amended.

The House took up the amendments reported by the Committee; when various propositions were successively made and discussed to disagree to or amend many of them.

The House having at length gone through the amendments, the bill was ordered to be engrossed, as amended, nem. con., and read a third time tomorrow.

Mr. SPENCER then offered a joint resolution, that the two Houses should adjourn on Wednesday, the 24th instant, to meet again on Monday, the 29th instant. The resolution was twice read, and ordered to be engrossed for a third reading—was subsequently read a third time and passed—yeas 84, nays 63.

And the House adjourned.

WEDNESDAY, December 24.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of the heirs of Landon Carter, deceased." The bill was reported without amendment, and referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report on the petition of John Bate, to him referred; which was ordered to lie on the table, but was subsequently taken up, and referred to the Committee of Claims.

The bill for the relief of Joel Earwood; the bill for the relief of Samuel Arkman; a bill making provision for the establishment of additional land offices in Missouri Territory, severally passed through a Committee of the Whole, and were ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The bill for the further relief of John Thompson passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was rejected; but was subsequently, at the instance of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, reconsidered, and ordered to lie on the table.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the "bill by which the right of citizenship may be relinquished."

On suggestion of Mr. LOWNDES, that this was a subject of too much importance to be acted on with so thin a House, Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, (the author of the bill,) consented to its postponement, by the Committee rising, and obtaining leave to sit again.

On motion of Mr. DRAKE, of Massachusetts, the Committee of Commerce and Manufactures were instructed to inquire into the expediency of granting bounties to manufacturers who manufacture a given number of yards of woollen and cotton cloths of a certain width, and that a permanent fund be appropriated for that purpose.

SURVIVING REVOLUTIONARY PATRIOTS.

The bill providing for certain surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolutionary Army was read a third time.

A motion was made by Mr. LOWNDES to recommit the bill to a Committee of the Whole House, with instructions "to limit the benefit of the act to soldiers who were enlisted for a term of three years, or for the war, and who did not desert; and to officers who continued in the service of the United States to the conclusion of the war in 1783, or were left out of the service in consequence of disability, or in consequence of some derangement of the Army."

The question being stated on thus recommitting the bill, Mr. EDWARDS moved to amend the said instructions by striking out the words "three years," and to insert in lieu thereof the words "one year."

And the question being taken thereon, it was decided in the affirmative.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said, a proposition had been made, if he understood correctly, by the gentlemen from South Carolina, to recommit the bill to a Committee of the whole House, with instructions so to amend it as to limit the benefits of the act to soldiers who were enlisted for a term of three years, or for the war, and who did not desert, and to officers who continued in the service of the United States to the conclusion of the war in 1783, or who were left out of the service in consequence of disability, or of some derangement of the Army.

Mr. J. said, he was opposed to such limitation. The discrimination would exclude many officers and soldiers, one-half at least, who were embraced in the present provisions of the bill. It now provides, said Mr. J., for officers of every grade who served in the Revolutionary war, and who are now in a state of indigence, and unable to procure a livelihood by their own exertions, the sum of twenty dollars per month to each; and eight dollars per month to each of the gallant soldiers of the Revolution, who are thus reduced to penury and inability. It is well known to all, that the great contest in which the United States were engaged, for the establishment and defence of their independence, substantially terminated in 1781, when General Washington, at the head of the combined forces of the Union, compelled the British General Lord Cornwallis to surrender, and led captive the legions under his command. After that glorious event, many officers and men retired to private life and civil pursuits, under the full conviction that the conflict was then at an end; and the event justified their conclusion. The forces of the contending parties, from that time, confined themselves to the duties of the camp; and if skirmishing parties sometimes came into contact, it was more by casualty than design.

To confine the bounty of the Government, therefore, to those who continued in the service until the Treaty of Peace, would be to exclude one-half of those who braved the danger of the field in devotion to their country's cause, and are now entitled to protection and support. Nor can I concur in the sentiment that it is necessary for a soldier to have served for the term of three years to entitle him to the gratitude of his country. Will this amendment embrace the volunteers who traversed the Western wilds with General Clark? Will it embrace the militia, upon whom draughts were made in all cases of emergency—who were called upon in every crisis of the Revolution, and who never failed, in the hour of trial and danger, to come to the help of the Lord against the mighty? Whatever sentiment may prevail as to their inefficiency, experience confirms the opinion that they were equally useful, and equally important in their place, with the gallant soldiers of the Continental line. I do not, therefore, see the propriety of requiring this term of service. It is needless to call to the recollection of this House the many glorious achievements of our Revolutionary heroes, which demonstrate the fact that not three, nor even one year's services is necessary to render the most essential benefits to the cause of independence. They naturally crowd upon every mind whenever that struggle becomes the theme of contemplation, and bear conviction to the heart that these heroes of liberty, from whose fortitude and valor the present blessings of our country have, in a great measure, resulted, are really entitled to the gratitude and consideration of the Government.

Mr. J. said, it was sufficient, in his opinion, to guard against imposition, by making service and poverty the basis of the bill. He was unwilling to add greater limitations, or any principle, which would restrain, beyond these points, the bounty and generosity of the nation.

I have attended, said Mr. J., to the deliberations upon this subject, with great anxiety, for a week past, and with heart-felt felicity, have marked the disposition of the House, beyond what has been manifested on any former occasion, to provide for the war-worn soldiers of the Revolution. My eyes, said he, have been constantly fixed upon the venerable patriot from New Jersey, (Gen. BLOOMFIELD) who has so frequently presented himself to the House in favor of his gallant countrymen and faithful compatriots in arms. With gratitude to heaven, do I view the agency of Divine Providence, in bringing him into this House, with the frost of seventy Winters upon his head, to plead the cause of those who breasted the storm of the Revolution. The sympathetic ardor in which that venerable patriot has discharged his duty, both to his country and to his brethren in arms, combined with the unaffected modesty of his manner, has excited the deepest sensibility. I have abstained from taking part in the debate, fearing that it might have injured the cause; but I hope to be excused on the present occasion, in troubling the House, particularly when I discover that the chairman of the committee who reported the bill, is exhausted with fatigue, and the bill is now on its passage.

A crisis, and to me, said Mr. J., an awful crisis of this business has arrived. Recommit the bill, and I fear it is lost forever, amid the diversity of opinions which we discover upon the subject. Some would confine the benefits of the bill to the Continental troops; others would extend them to the State troops and militia. Some would embrace in its provisions the rich as well as the poor; others would limit the bounty to the needy. Some would provide for those only who served during the war; some for those who served three years: some would limit the term of service at one year, and some at six months. Some would exclude the felon and the traitor, and others would embrace, indiscriminately, all who braved the dangers of the field. Amidst these jarring opinions, if we recommit the bill, it may be lost forever.

I am satisfied, said Mr. J., to provide for the surviving officers and soldiers of the Revolution, who are poor and needy, and who cannot procure a livelihood by their own exertions. Very few of these worthies now remain, and but few of these will claim the benefit of this country. Many distinguished citizens of the United States are now engaged, by associations and contributions, to provide a refuge of safety and repose for the unfortunate Africans among us, and it is said, that the territory is already in contemplation upon their native continent. The moral and religious world is zealously engaged in the meritorious work of forming numerous missionary societies, and in bestowing liberal donations, to disseminate the heavenly doctrines of the Gospel, and the sublime principles of Christian morality, even among the benighted Hindoos, as well as among the aborigines of America. Every enlightened class is now engaged in the holy work of distributing the word of God to the poor, both in our own and in foreign domains. Even the monarchies of Europe are at this moment uniting in measures to secure the continent of Africa from the curses of the slave trade. In this age of philanthropy, while contemplating these benevolent undertakings, the mind naturally turns to the indigent American, and inquires, with anxious solicitude, whether the officer and soldier of the Revolution are not equally worthy of our regard. With pleasure we behold the world, upon the broad basis of universal charity, embracing in its benevolence the best gifts of the Creator, and extending those gifts to the universe. But, superadded to the common obligation of benevolence, we are bound, by the strongest ties of gratitude and justice, while we reap the fruit of their toils and perils, to administer this last consolation which hoary age can enjoy at our hands.

In tracing the history of nations, we see but few States in which liberty has been enjoyed, and in these few States it has found but a transient abode. In the general prevalence of despotism, liberty has maintained an existence only upon the mountain's brow, and in craggy cliffs, which scarcely presented sufficient charms to invite the cupidity of tyrants; and now, not a foot of soil in the universe can boast the freedom which we enjoy. But here a happy scene presents itself. And all the luxuries of nature, sweetened with Heaven-born liberty, wanton around us; and this liberty is the fruit of these men's valor. Their happiness or misery, for the little remnant of their days, awaits the fate of this bill. In that book which inculcates the purest sentiments of benevolence, we read of a pool where the sick, the lame, and the halt, waited for the troubling of the waters, to be healed of their miseries. Here, sir, have the officer and soldier of the Revolution been waiting for these thirty-five years for the troubling of the waters; and, I beseech you, let not their hopes be blasted. At a moment like this, when expectation is all alive, disappointment would be more than their trembling limbs could sustain; but your favorable decision this day will confer that reward which will smoothe the declivity of life, and secure the dying blessing of the friends of liberty, the benefactors of their country.

But, sir, I will not further trespass upon your time. I thank the House for the patience with which they have listened to these remarks. When I arose, it was not my intention to have detained you thus long; but an earnest solicitude for the founders of American independence would not suffer me to say less; and I trust the decision will show that it were needless to say more.

After a considerable debate, in which Messrs. MILLER, OGLE, and RHEA took part, a division of the question being required, it was taken on recommitting the bill, and decided in the negative, ayes 57.

The question was then taken on the final passage of the bill, and decided in the affirmative without a division.

REMISSION OF DUTIES.

The bill for the remission of the duties on the painting presented by Benjamin West to the Pennsylvania Hospital was then taken up in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NEWTON, of Virginia, said the object of the bill under consideration was to remit, to the Pennsylvania Hospital, the duties on a painting, called "Christ in the Temple, healing the Sick," presented to that institution by Benjamin West. The British Government, with a liberality and promptitude that does honor to it, remitted every charge incident to the exportation. The reception of it in this country would, Mr. N. said, he trusted, be met by the Government in a spirit not less gracious and liberal. The munificence of this celebrated artist—a munificence, the exercise of which belongs only to genius of a superior order, and of extensive acquirements—would, he hoped, be acknowledged in such a manner as to manifest the sense this Government entertains of the respect shown by him for this nation. The painting, Mr. N. added, is considered as the chef d'œuvre of his pencil. The present is designed as a memento of the love that illustrious man bears his native land. It is also highly complimentary to the taste and judgment of this nation. The painting, moreover, reflects honor on this country, and extends its fame, as it is the production of an American. Permit me, said Mr. N., to congratulate my country on her rising fame. The genius and skill displayed by Trumbull, by Stewart, by Vanderlyn, by Sully, by Peale, and many others, secure to each an imperishable fame, and to their country, renown. A new epoch has commenced—its progress is auspicious. The Grecian, Italian, Flemish, French, and British schools, will be rivalled and equalled, in time, by our own. I congratulate those who are endowed by genius, but whose means are too limited to enable them to seek, in distant regions, the acquirements necessary to form and fix their judgment, and to give to their taste the characters of delicacy and correctness, on the prospect they have of completing their studies in their native land, under political institutions that give to genius their full scope, and the enjoyment of its creations, and that leave to emulation the influence of developing its powers. The inspiration thus kindled, diffused and made active, will bestow on their works whatever can delight and enchant the mind, and soften and meliorate the heart. Mr. N. asked pardon for this trespass. Had he said less—and less he could not have said—he should not have performed his duty, and done justice to his feelings. He hoped the bill would pass unanimously.

The bill was reported to the House, ordered to be engrossed, and subsequently read a third time, and passed.

MONDAY, December 29.

Mr. RUEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, made an unfavorable report on the petition of James Bursiel; which was agreed to.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, made unfavorable reports on the petitions of Roswell Woodworth, of James Prince, of Jacob Greer, and of Abraham Byington; the two first of which were agreed to, and the third, on motion of Mr. EDWARDS, laid on the table. The report on the case of A. Byington was, on motion of Mr. RICH, so far modified as to discharge him, in part, from the debt for which he is responsible as security, (that part partaking of the nature of a penalty,) and the report, as amended, was recommitted to the Committee of Claims, to bring in a bill accordingly.

Mr. PINDALL, from the committee to whom the subject had been referred, reported a bill to amend the act respecting the recovery of fugitives from justice, and persons escaping from the service of their masters, [providing the means to be pursued for the recovery of slaves escaping into another State, and affixing the penalties for harboring such fugitives or obstructing their recovery, &c.] The bill was twice read and committed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a report from the Secretary of War, made in pursuance of a resolution of the House, embracing a list of all officers who held brevet rank in the Army at the close of the late war, their lineal rank at the time of receiving the brevet; and a list of officers of the present Army who hold brevet rank higher than their lineal rank, and the number and grade of such officers as receive, in virtue of their brevet rank, greater pay or emoluments than they would otherwise be entitled to by law; which report was ordered to lie on the table, and be printed.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a report from the Commissioner of Claims, of the facts of the cases of Richard Mansfield, of William B. Holmes, and Mary Sears, and of Samuel Hughes, referred to him; which was referred to the Committee of Claims.

The SPEAKER communicated also a report (of facts only) from the Secretary of the Treasury, on the petition of John Peters and Saben Pond, which had been referred to him. The report was ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. POINDEXTER offered the following motion:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of authorizing the President of the United States to exchange with the Choctaw and Chickasaw tribes of Indians, or either of them, lands belonging to the United States, west of the Mississippi, for lands now in the possession and occupancy of said tribes of Indians, or either of them.

On motion of Mr. COBB, (after some conversation with the mover, and his assenting thereto,) the resolution was amended by including therein the "Creek and Cherokee" Indians, whose territory, within the limits of Georgia, Mr. C. thought it equally important should be obtained by the United States. In this shape, and after, on motion of Mr. TAYLOR, referring the inquiry to the Committee on the Public Lands, instead of a select committee, the resolution was agreed to.

The House resumed the consideration of the motion submitted by Mr. WENDOVER, of New York, for so amending the rules and orders of the House that not more than three bills shall be referred to the same Committee of the Whole. [In support of this motion, Mr. W. made a statement of the practice of the House under the present rules, inferring from it that the practice of referring so many bills to one committee tended to the procrastination of business, and operated frequently as a denial of a consideration of the subject of the bills so referred.] After some further remarks from Mr. BASSETT and Mr. TAYLOR, the motion was agreed to.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Commissioner of the General Land Office cause to be engraved a plate of the Surveyor General's official map of the military bounty lands in the Territory of Illinois, and cause to be printed six hundred copies thereof, subject to the future disposition of Congress.

Mr. T. explained his object in moving this resolution, which was to procure, at a small expense, to each soldier, along with his bounty land, a map on which its location, &c., should be designated, and which would enable him better to estimate the value of his land. Such a provision, he thought, would be as useful to him as any other provision, in respect to securing him from the arts of the speculator, that Congress could make. The cost he had inquired into, and found that it would not exceed a few cents for each copy.

This motion was supported by Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, and others, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, by a vote of 69 to 58.

The amendments of the Senate to the Mint bill, which go to limit its provisions to five years' continuance in force, were taken up, and agreed to.

The engrossed bill for the relief of S. Aickman, the engrossed bill for the relief of Joel Earwood, and the engrossed bill for making provision, by law, for the establishment of additional land offices in the Missouri Territory, were severally read a third time, and passed.

The bill for the relief of Winslow and Henry Lewis passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

APPOINTMENT OF MEMBERS TO OFFICE.

The following Message was received from the PRESIDENT OF THE UNITED STATES:

To the House of Representatives of the United States:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th of this month, requesting to be informed whether any, and which of the Representatives, in a list thereto annexed, have held offices since the 4th of March last, designating the offices, the times of appointment and acceptance, and whether they were at that time so held, or when they had been resigned, I now transmit a report from the Secretary of State, which contains the information desired.

JAMES MONROE.

DECEMBER 29, 1817.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE, Dec. 26, 1817.

The resolution of the House of Representatives of the 12th of this month, requesting the President to communicate to that House whether any, and which of the Representatives named in the list thereto annexed, have held offices since the 4th of March last, designating the offices, the times of appointment and acceptance, and whether they were at that time so held, or when they had been resigned, having been referred to this department, the Secretary has the honor respectfully to report to the President as follows:

John Holmes, of Massachusetts, Commissioner under the 4th article of the Treaty of Ghent, appointed 16th February, 1816, resigned 24th November, 1817.

Samuel Herrick, of Ohio, Attorney of the United States, appointed 19th December, 1810, resigned 29th November, 1817.

Daniel Cruger, of New York, postmaster at Bath, appointed 29th June, 1815, resigned 1st December, 1817.

Elias Earle, of South Carolina, postmaster at Centreville, appointed in April, 1815, resigned 12th June, 1817.

Thomas H. Hubbard, of New York, postmaster at Hamilton, appointed 11th March, 1813, resigned 23d October, 1817.

Samuel C. Crafts, of Vermont, principal assessor for the sixth collection district, appointed 4th January, 1815, resigned 5th June, 1817.

George Robertson, of Kentucky, principal assessor for the seventh collection district, appointed 4th January, 1815, resigned 5th June, 1817.

George Mumford, of North Carolina, principal assessor for the tenth collection district. No resignation has been received from Mr. Mumford.

Levi Barber, of Ohio, receiver of public moneys at Marietta, appointed 3d March, 1807, resigned 1st December, 1817.

John F. Parrott, of New Hampshire, naval officer for the district of Portsmouth, appointed 23d April, 1816, resigned 15th November, 1817.

JOHN QUINCY ADAMS.

Referred to the Committee of Elections.

PETITION OF A. WORSTER.

The House having resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the report of the Committee of Claims on the petition of Alexander Worster, Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, moved to reverse the report, which is unfavorable to the petition. This motion was supported by the mover, and opposed by Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, the chairman of the Committee of Claims.

[The case is that of an officer enlisting a minor, through erroneous information, who prays Congress to indemnify him for loss sustained in consequence of damages recovered from him by the relatives of said minor.]

The Committee agreed to reverse the report, 63 to 48; and the Committee having risen, the question of concurrence in this decision being put, and the yeas and nays thereon having been required by Mr. POINDEXTER,

On motion of Mr. HOPKINSON, who desired further time to inquire into the facts, the report was ordered to lie on the table, 65 to 61.

AMERICAN AND BRITISH TONNAGE.

On motion of Mr. PITKIN,

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House a statement of American and foreign tonnage employed in the foreign trade of the United States in the years 1815 and 1816, and, as far as practicable, in the year 1817, distinguishing the nations to whom the foreign tonnage belonged; also, a statement of American and British tonnage employed in the trade between the United States and the British dominions in Europe for each of the said years, distinguishing the amount employed between the United States and the united kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, and the other British European dominions.

That the Secretary of the Treasury be also directed to lay before the House a statement showing the amount of British tonnage in the trade between the United States and the British West Indies, and between the United States and the British North American colonies in 1815, 1816, and 1817, containing the amount entered in and cleared from the American ports in each of said years.

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Treasury be directed to lay before the House a statement showing the quantity of sugar, coffee, rum, molasses, and cocoa imported into and exported from the United States in each of the years 1815, 1816, and 1817, together with the countries and places from whence the same were imported, and the quantity imported from each country and place.

In submitting his motion, Mr. PITKIN briefly remarked on the importance of the information which the resolutions called for, and the necessity there was for the House being in possession of it, particularly in certain interesting questions which would come before the House on the subject of trade and navigation.

TUESDAY, December 30.

Mr. TRIMBLE presented a petition of the Abolition Society of Kentucky, praying that the plan, at present before the National Legislature, for colonizing the free people of color, may be carried into effect.—Referred to the Committee appointed on the petition of the representatives of the annual meeting of the society of Friends in Baltimore.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act to extend the time for locating Virginia military land warrants, and returning surveys thereon to the General Land Office; and for designating the western boundary line of the Virginia military line," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The bill was read twice, and referred to the committee appointed on the 17th instant, on the subject.

Mr. H. NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, reported a bill providing for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Mississippi; and the bill was twice read, and committed.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of Colonel John Anderson, indemnifying him for the amount of damages, (four hundred dollars,) recovered from him for acts done in the performance of his military duty; which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. HERRICK, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, to whom was referred the petition of the legal representatives of Elisha Winter and of William Winter, praying confirmation of their titles to certain lands in the Missouri Territory, made a report thereon, accompanied by a bill for the relief of the petitioners; which was twice read, and committed.

The bill to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Society of Alexandria passed through a Committee of the Whole; and, its merits having been briefly explained by Mr. HERBERT, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading on Monday.

A motion was made by Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, to go into a Committee on his Expatriation bill, but was negatived.

On motion of Mr. BASSETT, but at the instance of Mr. CLAGETT, the House agreed to reconsider the report of the Committee of Pensions, (yesterday concurred in,) unfavorable to the petition of James Burceil; and the report was ordered to lie on the table.

The engrossed bill for the relief of Winslow and Henry Lewis, was read the third time and passed.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of the Treasury, communicating, in obedience to a resolution of the House, a statement of the receipts into the Treasury from imports and other taxes within the District of Columbia since the year 1801; also the amount of registered tonnage in the said District; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia.

Mr. MERCER offered for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That the committee to whom was referred the memorial of the American Colonization Society, be instructed to inquire into the expediency of making such further alterations in the laws prohibiting the citizens of the United States from engaging in the African slave trade, as may more effectually secure their intended operation; and that the said committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise,

In offering this motion, Mr. MERCER made a few remarks, which his distance from the reporter caused to be indistinctly heard. He said that if any apology were required of him for it, it would be found in the Message of the late President of the United States, in which the attention of the House was forcibly called to this interesting subject. Transactions of the nature referred to by the resolution, Mr. M. said, daily occurred under the American flag, disgraceful to the American name—a name dear to all who heard him—a flag glorious in its renown—and these transactions of a character injurious alike to the prosperity and honor of mankind.

The motion was agreed to, nem. con.

MILITARY BOUNTY LANDS.

The engrossed joint resolution, introduced by Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, authorizing the Commissioner of the General Land Office to have engraved a copy of the Surveyor General's map of the military bounty lands in the Territory of Illinois, and to cause to be printed six hundred copies thereof, was read the third time.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he had made some inquiries on this subject, and had ascertained that the expense would be much greater than had been supposed; that the maps would cost from two to three dollars a copy, and, if there was no objection on that ground, he feared they could not be executed in time to be of service to those now possessing patents. Another objection with him was, that the map proposed was to comprehend only a part of the land surveyed. He would prefer, if one was engraved at all, that it should embrace the whole military land. But, inasmuch as he could see no great advantage in the proposition, but a considerable expense, he was opposed to it altogether.

Mr. TAYLOR stated, in reply, that he had been misunderstood as to the supposed expense. He had been informed by the Commissioner of the General Land Office that a map of the military land in Illinois Territory could be engraved for five hundred dollars, and the engraving, paper, and printing might amount to three or four dollars each; but there were fifty thousand soldiers to whom patents had and would issue, who would be benefited by this map—amongst whom, if the expense was averaged, it would not exceed four or five cents each. It was not necessary that each soldier should have a copy; the maps might be so distributed at the court-houses of the different counties, &c., as that many soldiers might have access to and derive all necessary information from one copy. The map at present published of the military bounty lands, he thought, did not give the requisite information; that which was now proposed might be so completed in two or three months at furthest, if executed in the manner of other maps of the public lands, and the benefit be extended to all except the few soldiers who had parted with their patents, &c.

The question on the passage of the resolution was then put, and negatived by a large majority. So the resolution was rejected.

THE ACT OF NEUTRALITY.

Mr. MILLER, of South Carolina, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a committee be appointed to inquire into the expediency of so amending the fourth section of the act passed on the 3d of March, 1817, entitled "An act more effectually to preserve the neutral relations of the United States," as to embrace within the provisions thereof the armed vessels of a Government, at peace with the United States, and at war with any colony, district, or people, with whom the United States are or may be at peace.

Mr. MILLER called the attention of the House to the act of the last session, wherein it would be seen that, by an oversight, certainly, because it could not have been the intention of the House, that the vessels of Old Spain might now enter our harbors and increase their force, while those of the colonies were prohibited from so doing. The omission of the words, "district or people," in this part of the act, gave to it a force as to the vessels of the colonies which it did not possess in regard to Spain, who was not at war with any "Prince or State" at peace with the United States. The operation of the law thus exclusively favored Old Spain, which, Mr. M. repeated, never could have been the intention of the House. The act, as it originally passed this House, contained no such provision; and the error could only be accounted for by its having passed when returned from the Senate without due attention. It was the deliberate sense of Congress, at the last session, that the United States ought to assume an attitude entirely neutral, in the contest between Spain and her colonies; but this act having a different aspect, he had thought it his duty to bring the subject to the view of the House, that it might immediately act on this point. It was true that a committee of this House was already charged with the whole subject; what they meant to do in relation to it he knew not; perhaps they might intend to offer an entirely new system; but, on this point, he thought Congress ought to act without reference to any general system. The partial error should be rectified by a special act.

Mr. FOSYTH said it might be recollected by the House, that the Committee on Foreign Relations were specially charged with the whole subject of the neutral relations of the United States. That committee, he stated, had not reported, because they had not received all the information they wished from the Executive offices, but which they were in hourly expectation of receiving. When received, the committee would report with promptitude. Mr. F. vindicated the Committee on Foreign Relations of last session, and the House, from participation in the error which was apparent in the act; for, as the gentleman from South Carolina had truly stated, it was the object of the House of Representatives, and, he believed, of the Congress, to pass an act to preserve to each party all its rights as a neutral nation. The bill which passed this House was framed for that special purpose, and would have answered it. The Senate, preferring a different form for the bill, had struck out the whole of it except the enacting clause, and passed the bill as the act now stands. The bill which passed the Senate was brought into this House after ten o'clock on the last night of the session. At that hour it was impossible to give the bill so critical an examination as, under different circumstances, it would have received; and this verbal inaccuracy had been overlooked; for he was satisfied, he said, that the error itself had been one of inadvertence, merely.

In conclusion, Mr. F. observed, he could say with confidence that, if the Committee on Foreign Relations did nothing else on the subject referred to them, they would attend to this object; and he therefore hoped the House would not, by this resolution, take the subject out of their hands.

Mr. MILLER said that, the reason which the gentleman from Georgia had offered why the committee had not reported, was the very reason why he had proposed this motion. That committee had before it other matters requiring deliberation and further information; but it was no reason for refusing to remedy a particular error, that the committee wished to form a system. If that argument prevailed, and the President were to delay until the last day of the session the information desired, there would be no opportunity of correcting a mere verbal inaccuracy, self-evident, requiring no information, and of merely making a particular act what Congress originally intended it should have been. Commutation Bill—Georgia Militia Claims.

H. OF R.

Cobbett's letter on the subject of the act in question, in which this error was alluded to, Mr. M. said, he would avail himself of any suggestion from any quarter having for its object to place the United States in an entirely neutral position. The moment he was placed in possession of the fact of an inequality in any of our laws on this head, that moment he was for acting on it, without waiting for the report of a system which had no necessary connexion with it.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, seeing that the subject was already generally referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations, moved to amend the proposed resolution, so as to refer it to that committee instead of a select committee.

Mr. MILLER, regarding such a reference as a special charge to that committee, accepted Mr. HOLMES's amendment as part of his motion.

Mr. FORSYTH said, if the House, indeed, thought it all-important that this error should be immediately corrected; that it was important to the interest of the colonies and of the United States, that the error should be corrected the moment it was pointed out by Mr. Cobbett, or by anybody, this resolution might have some claim to the favor of the House. But, Mr. F. said, no evil had arisen, nor would arise, from the error, before it is corrected; he would say, without fear of contradiction, that no Spanish vessel had been armed, or had her armament increased, since the passage of that act, or would be now. As this subject was already in the view of the committee, and within the scope of its duties, Mr. F. hoped this special instruction would not be given.

Mr. EDWARDS, of North Carolina, concurred in opinion that the proposed alteration of the law ought to be made; but he had full confidence in the committee which was already charged with the investigation of the subject, and it was no more than ordinary courtesy, after the assurance received from the chairman of that committee, (Mr. FORSYTH,) that this special instruction should not be given. He therefore moved that the resolve lie on the table.

Mr. MILLER said, in addition to the general propriety of his motion, he had just received information that vessels of war were actually building in New York for the use of the Spanish Government. But, he said, if no inconveniences have resulted from the defect of the law, it does not follow that they may not. To rescue this House from the imputation of a partiality which it had never been their intention to have manifested, he was desirous to have the subject immediately and specially acted on.

Mr. FORSYTH said, if the gentleman's information was correct, that armed vessels were preparing for the use of Spain in our ports, that was a case amply provided for already by the law. The Government of the United States is authorized to seize and its courts to condemn such vessels, one half to the use of the informer, the other half to the use of the Treasury. The section in which the error had been detected, referred only to an increase of the armament of foreign vessels already armed: a former section of the same act amply provided for the case the gentleman had cited.

The question to lay the resolution on the table, was decided in the affirmative—79 to about 50 votes.

COMMUTATION BILL.

The House, on motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, resumed the consideration of the bill to commute the bounty lands of the soldiers of the late Army. The question being on concurring in the amendments reported to the House by the Committee of the Whole—

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, rose for the purpose of offering an amendment, which would essentially change the features of the bill; in doing which, he entered somewhat into an examination of the merits of the principle of the commutation, which he decidedly approved. This amendment, in substance, authorizes every soldier, on surrendering his warrant at the land office to be cancelled, to receive a certificate of the quantity of land surrendered; and where patents have issued, the patentee to surrender his patent to the Commissioner of the General Land Office within — months after the passage of this act, in order to avail himself of the provisions thereof, and deposit at the same time an affidavit that he has not transferred or sold such patent to any person whatever, and receive a certificate therefor; and for these certificates such soldier or his agent shall receive certificates of stock bearing an interest of six per cent. per annum, redeemable at the pleasure of the Government, or within five years, at the rate of one dollar per acre for the land for which the warrant or patent has been surrendered, &c. Mr. R. thought the bill important, both as it regarded the soldier and the United States, but infinitely more important to the interest of the latter. It was all-important, he argued, that these lands should be taken out of the hands of speculators, and be redeemed by the nation. His amendment offered conditions to the soldier much more liberal, at the same time that it would be more convenient to the Government than the provisions of the present bill. The interest of both parties would be preserved, and the community rescued from that speculation which would, without this bill, certainly take place. Mr. R. dwelt some time on the policy of this measure—the expediency of which he illustrated by several arguments—and on the advantages of the change which he proposed in the bill.

The amendment offered by Mr. R. having been read—

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the proposed amendment was ordered to be printed and the whole subject to lie on the table.

GEORGIA MILITIA CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. COBB, of Georgia, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill providing for the payment of the claims of certain detachments of the militia of Georgia, for services in defence of that State, in the years 1793 and 1794.

Mr. COBB observed, that the filling the blank necessarily involved the merits of the bill, for, that, before the committee could be required to fill the blank with a certain sum, they should be satisfied whether anything was due. He hoped he should be able satisfactorily to convince the committee of the justice of the claim, and that the sum proposed was the proper amount to be appropriated.

Mr. C. said, that the pacification of the Indian tribes, which was anticipated by the treaties made with them between the years 1787 and 1792, was not accomplished. In the year 1792, the tribes upon the Northwestern frontiers of the United States, from British intrigues, as was then and yet is believed, assumed an attitude of widely extended hostility. Nor was it long before their threatenings terminated in a war, so dreadful in its character, that the people of the Northwest yet have cause to remember it with grief and sorrow. The tribes upon the frontiers of the State of Georgia, as savage in their character, and more formidable in point of numbers, were not much less inclined to hostility. They were subject to the same influence which had been exercised upon their Northern brethren, aided by that of Spain, with which power the United States were at that time in warm dispute, about the navigation of the Mississippi river, and for other causes. The intrigues of Spain were at that time well known, and scarcely denied, as the public documents of the day amply testify. Of this, any gentleman could satisfy himself by consulting the volume of secret documents, lately published. From these causes, Mr. C. said, in the years 1792-3, the situation of the inhabitants upon the Western frontiers of Georgia, was alarming to an indescribable degree. Suffice it to say, as had once before been said upon the same subject, that the peaceable citizen knew not, when he retired to repose, that he would ever awake; or, if he did, that he might not be roused by the horrid yells of the savage war-whoop, and but to behold his helpless family the bleeding victims of the Indian tomahawk and scalping knife.

It was not to be expected, that the Executive of Georgia would calmly behold the blood-chilling scenes of murder and depredation, at that time but commencing upon the frontiers of the State. Had he done so, he would have merited and received the curses of his countrymen and posterity. Fortunately, the Executive chair of the State was then filled by one who was ever feelingly alive to the sufferings of his fellow-citizens. He now reposes in the grave! But his virtues and his patriotism are yet remembered, and his loss deplored. I allude, said Mr. C. to the late Governor Telfair.

Early in the year 1792, he made the necessary communications to the War Department. On the 27th of October of that year, the Secretary at War, by letter, gave him a most ample discretionary power, as the extract following will show: "If the information you may receive, shall substantiate clearly any hostile designs of the Creeks against the frontiers of Georgia, you will be pleased to take the most effectual measures 'for the defence thereof, which may be in your power, and which the occasion may require.'" It is impossible that words better suited to conferring an ample discretionary power could have been used. The Governor of Georgia is constituted the judge of the danger and of the amount of the force. The state of the frontiers required that such a power should be conferred, at that particular time, and it was conferred. It was necessary, because of the uncertainty of the extent to which the Indians would carry their hostility. It was necessary, because of the difficulty, and trouble, and expense, of bringing a militia force into action, none of which should be encountered, if to be avoided without danger.

In acting under this power, the Executive of Georgia acted with caution and prudence. The power was conferred in October 1792. From that time, until the month of April, 1793, the dangers increased, and acts of depredation and murder multiplied on the frontiers. Longer delay of action would have been criminal. On the 23d of April, 1793, Governor Telfair addressed the following letter to John Habersham, then the agent of the United States for furnishing supplies in Georgia: "Sir, the very critical situation to which the frontier settlers are reduced, from the late murders and depredations committed by the Indians, renders it indispensable that means be taken to guard against their inroads. I have made the communications to the War Department, and, in the interim, have to request your issuing orders to the contractors to provide rations for such part or parts of the militia of this State as may be called into service, to be furnished at the several stations and places of rendezvous. In order that you may be informed how far such a measure is correspondent with the system adopted by the General Government, I herewith furnish a certified copy of a clause of a letter from the Secretary of War, dated 27th October 1892," (the one already read,) "on the subject of Indian affairs." Upon the receipt of this letter, with the extract referred to, the agent, Mr. Habersham, had not a doubt as to the powers of the Governor. He conceived them to be so ample, so unbounded indeed, that he did not hesitate a moment to give to the Governor an assurance, that his requisition for supplies should meet with prompt attention. The reply of Mr. Habersham, dated on the same 23d of April, will at once prove this. "Being of opinion," says he, "that I shall be justified by the aforesaid clause in doing so, I shall immediately give directions to the contractor, who is now here, to furnish supplies to such of the militia as may be drawn out under the sanction of your Excellency, and will communicate the same to the Secretary of War, and the commanding officer of the federal troops in this State without delay." Under this power, and under these arrangements with the officers of the United States, the Governor of Georgia proceeded to call the militia into service. Need it be again said, how properly?

Mr. C. said that it was greatly to be regretted, that the pay rolls, which only would afford evidence of the precise force called into the field, and their time of service, had been destroyed in the conflagration of the public buildings in this city by the British in the year 1814. He was happy, however, to have it in his power to assure the Committee, that, from information which he had received, and which he was disposed to credit, a duplicate of the pay rolls was yet in existence in the State of Georgia. For all the purposes of correct legislation, there was sufficient evidence to be found in certain estimates, which have not been destroyed, and which were calculated from the pay-rolls before their destruction. From these, the names of most of the officers, with the number (without the names) of their men, and the length of their terms of service, could be ascertained. The estimates, together with a letter from the Secretary at War to the Governor of Georgia, show that, at one period, there were from eight hundred to one thousand two hundred militia in the field. The estimates also proved the fact, that the militia were mostly detached for short terms of service, and were discharged when the danger of the frontiers no longer required their services.

Even upon the supposition, that the full number of twelve hundred men had been kept in service from April, 1793, until June, 1794, (at which day they were disbanded,) he thought that he should be able to show to the Committee, that the force was not disproportioned to the danger which threatened. The frontiers of the State of Georgia extended along the borders of two nations of Indians, at that time equally hostile. The whole extent of the exposed frontier was upwards of four hundred miles from the Tugeloo river around the western parts of the State, to the mouth of the St. Mary's river. It is well known, that all that British and Spanish intrigues could do, was done to excite both these nations to a war. North Carolina, South Carolina, and the territory which has since been created into the State of Tennessee, were engaged in an active war, as well of defence as invasion, with the Cherokees and Upper Creeks, to whose ravages the upper parts of the State of Georgia were equally as much or more exposed. On the southern frontier were the Lower Creeks, who had already commenced the work of death and slaughter. The frontier, in its whole length, was but thinly inhabited. Add to all these considerations the fact, that the Governor of Georgia was confined to defensive operations only, and was restricted from prosecuting the war by invading the Creek nation. The fact will be learned from the letter of the Secretary of War to the Governor of Georgia, dated the 30th May, 1793. Had the wishes of Governor Telfair been attended to, upon this subject—had he been permitted to carry the war into the heart of the enemies' country, as he one time prepared to do, and by which only can an Indian war be effectually terminated, this application for so large a sum would not now be made at the hands of Congress. From this measure he was however turned by the positive orders of the War Department in September, 1793. But, under all these circumstances, Mr. C. thought that the Committee would be convinced, that a less force than the one employed, would have been ineffectual even for the purpose of invasion, and he thought that any one, at all acquainted with Indian warfare, would be convinced, that it would be less effectual for defence. He was also willing to submit to the Committee, whether the Governor of Georgia exercised the discretion and the power conferred upon him in an incautious or imprudent manner.

Soon after the militia was called into service, the power of the Governor of Georgia was suspended, by a letter addressed to him from the Secretary of War, dated on the 30th of May, 1793. This letter is of the most extraordinary character. It declared, "that, from considerations of policy, at this critical period, relative to foreign Powers, and the pending treaty with the northern Indians, it is deemed advisable to avoid, for the present, offensive expeditions into the Creek country. But, from the circumstances of the late depredations on the frontiers of Georgia, it is thought expedient to increase the force in that quarter for defensive purposes. The President, therefore, authorizes your Excellency to call into and keep in service in addition to the regular force stationed in Georgia (which at that time could not have exceeded one hundred, and were of no use) one hundred horse and one hundred foot, to be employed under the orders of Colonel Gaither, in repelling inroads, as circumstances shall require." One hundred horse and one hundred foot to repel the inroads of two of the most savage and warlike tribes of Indians upon the whole continent, on a frontier extending upwards of four hundred miles! Sir, said Mr. C., the destruction and overthrow of such a force would have been but a pastime with the tribes. But it is not now my design to question the propriety of this policy. Before, however, the order could be executed, and the troops disbanded, on the 10th day of June, 1793, only ten days thereafter, the Executive of the United States seems to have been sensible of its impropriety, and, accordingly, in a letter to the Governor of Georgia, he says—"The State of Georgia being invaded, or in imminent danger thereof, the measures taken by your Excellency may be considered indispensable. You are the judge of the danger, and will undoubtedly proportion the defence to exigencies. The President, however, expresses his confidence, that as soon as the danger which has induced you to call out so large a body of troops, shall have subsided, that you will reduce the troops to the existing state of things, indeed to the number mentioned in my letter of the 30th ultimo, duplicates of which have been forwarded, provided the safety of the frontiers will admit the measure." If any doubts could have existed of the power given to the Governor of Georgia, before the receipt of this letter, they were put to rest thereafter. By this, he was expressly made the judge of the degree of danger, and of the number and extent of the force. It contains an acknowledgment of the fact, that a large body of troops had been called into service, but considers the measure as having been indispensable. It expresses a hope that the force will be reduced, yet leaving the Governor to judge when the safety of the frontiers will admit the reduction to take place.

After the receipt of this letter the Governor could not have mistaken his powers. To afford complete evidence, however, of this fact, Mr. C. called the attention of the Committee to a letter of the same date, (10th June, 1793,) from the War Department to the Governor of South Carolina, in which he is requested, "that, in case the frontiers of Georgia should be seriously invaded by large bodies of Indians, he would, upon the request of the Governor of Georgia, direct such parts of the militia of South Carolina to march to the assistance of Georgia, as the case might require; for the expenses of which the United States would be responsible." Here again is the Governor of Georgia recognised, as being the judge of the necessity of the call, and clothed with power of making the request of the Executive of South Carolina. But, it also contains evidence of another fact, that the detachment of the force by the order, or at the request of the Governor of Georgia, was at the expense of the United States.

The report of the committee at this session, upon the claim, says, that there is no evidence that this power was conclusively withdrawn from the Governor of Georgia, until February, 1794. There is, however, a letter of the 19th July, 1793, which Mr. Dearborn, Secretary at War, in his report, seems to think contained in it enough to amount to an order, withdrawing the power. This letter was sent by Constant Freeman, who had gone to the State of Georgia as agent of the War Department, for the express purpose of superintending all matters in which that department was concerned on that frontier. This letter contains an express order. Although the Secretary at War must have been apprized of the Governor's proceedings to a period as late as June 18th, of which date he acknowledges to have received letters from the Governor, yet does he bestow no censure for measures already adopted. His power is not withdrawn. The judgment and discretion which he had previously been required to exercise, was not questioned. On the contrary, from the month of September, 1793, until February, 1794, although the Department must have known the numbers and proceedings of the militia, no order was sent to disband the men. On the 22d February, 1794, a positive order was sent, and before 1st of June thereafter, the whole force called out, except certain specified corps, were dismissed. Even this order contains an expression, significant of the belief of the War Department, that the United States were liable for the expenses of the militia in service previous to that time. For it declares, that the United States would not, thereafter, be pledged for the expenses. This can mean nothing else than that the United States held themselves previously pledged; especially as, until that period, the issue of supplies of provisions had never been prohibited. That the Governor of Georgia did not consider his powers withdrawn is evident. The militia were retained until Governor Telfair went out of office, and for some months after Governor Matthews came into it. Even if the letter of 19th July, 1793, should be considered as an order to discharge the force called out, yet another argument in favor of this claim is to be derived from these facts. The claim is made by the individual persons performing the services, and not by the State. The Governor had power from the General Government to call them into service in the first instance. It was the duty of the militiaman to obey—it did not belong to him to call for the orders issued to his superiors, that he might judge whether his superiors had pursued them; nor ought he to be deprived of his pittance of pay, if his superiors have either neglected or exceeded their orders. If the power, by which he was called out, was, in the first instance, sufficient, his retention in service is not his fault, nor should he be the loser.

But, there are other arguments of the justice of the claim. It is a fact, that the whole force, be their numbers great or small, which was ordered into service by Governor Telfair, was furnished with provisions, and other supplies, by the United States' contractors, during the whole time of service, and his accounts were admitted and paid two years after the troops were disbanded. Certainly this fact, were there no others, would, of itself, be conclusive evidence, that the Executive of the United States considered the militia to have been in their service.

There is another circumstance well worthy of consideration. All other militia in service, during the same period, have been paid by the United States. Those of the Northwestern Territory, (now Kentucky and Ohio,) those of South Carolina, and those of the Southwestern Territory, (now State of Tennessee,) which last were waging a war of invasion, against positive orders, have all been paid by the Government. Upon what principle of justice, then, can the militia of Georgia alone be excluded from the equally hard-earned reward of services equally meritorious?

Sir, said Mr. C., let it not be said that the Governor of Georgia exceeded his authority—I hope I have proved that his authority was ample, and that he did no more than his duty, to the discharge of which he was urged by the very critical situation of the State over which he presided; nor let it be said, that the force detached was greater than necessary, because the murders and depredations of the Indians had in some measure ceased. The truth is, they did not cease, and, if less frequent, it was because of the character and imposing numbers of the force detached. With equal impropriety can it be said, that the State of Georgia is liable for these services. If I am correctly informed, there is not to be found, upon the records of the Legislature of that State, a single act or resolution directing the militia to be called out. The Constitution of the United States had intrusted the General Government with the common defence, so that the State there left the payment of this claim. Although frequent application has been made to the Legislature of that State, the claimants have uniformly been referred to the United States—they now, probably for the last time, ask justice at your hands; they can ask for it nowhere else, and they richly deserve it. Many a citizen, now basking in the sunshine of peace, has been saved by their services from an early and a bloody grave; they were ever ready when the hour of danger approached; many of them were soldiers, tried soldiers of the Revolution, and the names of some of the younger part of them are to be found on the list of those who fought and bled under General Floyd in the late war; many have filled, and some yet fill offices of high trust and honor in the State. It remains for this nation to show whether to such men they will any longer furnish a pretext for saying "Republicans are unjust, and my country is a Republic."

Mr. C. said he would not much longer detain the Committee. The sum with which he proposed to fill the blank, was the sum calculated by the Secretary at War to be due for all the services performed, as well by the particular corps of two hundred horse and two hundred foot expressly ordered into service, as by the militia called into service under the general authority given to Governor Telfair in the documents already read to the Committee. It might appear somewhat strange that anything should yet be due to the particular corps expressly ordered; yet it was true that there yet remained unpaid to them the sum of $13,159 63. "The remaining sum of $129,375 66," says the Secretary at War, "is for services which were not considered by the Executive of the United States, nor by the agent of the War Department, as fully authorized by the General Government, and for which no payments have been made." The Secretary is of opinion that these services "not fully authorized" ought, in justice, to be paid up for the year 1793. Mr. C. could see no reason why, if they were paid to that time, payment for the full period of service was not equally just. Any principles of justice which would extend to those who served in the latter part of the year 1793, would extend to those who served in 1794.

Mr. STORRS, with a view of giving time for further investigation of the grounds of this claim, moved that the Committee rise; which was agreed to. And the Committee obtained leave to sit again.

WEDNESDAY, December 31.

Another member, to wit: from South Carolina, JAMES ERVIN, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified and took his seat.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, presented a petition of the President and Directors, of the Auxiliary Colonization Society, of Frederick county, in the State of Virginia, praying that the plan at present before the National Legislature, for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, may be adopted and carried into effect.—Referred to the committee appointed on the petition of the representatives of the annual meeting of the society of Friends, in Baltimore.

On motion of Mr. STORRS, the Committee on Public Lands were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for the introduction into all patents hereafter to be issued, for lands sold or granted by the United States, of a reservation, to the use of the United States, of all gold and silver mines.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Secretary of War was directed to lay before this House a return of the arms and military stores furnished to the respective States, under the provisions of the laws of 1808, appropriating, annually, the sum of two hundred thousand dollars "for the furnishing arms and military equipments to the whole body of the militia of the United States;" and also to inform this House on what principle the distribution has been made.

On motion of Mr. HUNTINGTON, the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads were instructed to take into consideration the expediency of providing, by law, to authorize the Governors of States and Territories, for the time being, to receive and transmit through the post offices all official communications free of postage.

On motion of Mr. TALLMADGE, after a few remarks, explaining that, without some such provision, the widow of the lamented Lawrence would be in a few months utterly destitute of the means of support, it was

Resolved, That the Committee on Naval Affairs be instructed to inquire into the expediency of continuing the pension of half pay to the widow of Captain James Lawrence, deceased, during her widowhood; or, in case of its sooner termination, to his infant daughter, until she arrives to the age of twenty-one years.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on the Public Lands, who had been instructed to inquire what further provisions are necessary for the more effectual prevention of frauds in the purchase of lands, made a report adverse to any further provisions on the subject.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, from the Committee of Claims, reported a bill for the relief of John Anderson, of the Michigan Territory, which bill was twice read and committed.

Mr. EDWARDS offered the following resolution:

Resolved, That the President of the United States be requested to cause to be laid before this House information of the number of States which have ratified the 13th article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, proposed at the second session of the 11th Congress, [prohibiting any citizen of the United States from accepting or retaining any title of nobility, pension, office or emolument, without the consent of Congress, from any foreign Prince or Power, &c.]

Mr. EDWARDS* stated that his motion was induced by some doubts whether the article referred to had been ratified by a sufficient number of the States to make it a part of the Constitution, although it appeared as such, he perceived, in the copies printed for the use of the members of the House; and it was desirable that a fact so important should be placed beyond question. The motion was agreed to without opposition.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, submitted a joint resolution to authorize the publication of the laws of the United States within the several States and Territories of the United States, (authorizing the publication in any number of newspapers deemed proper, not exceeding six;) which was twice read, and referred to the Committee on the Judiciary.

The bill for the relief of John Anderson passed through a Committee of the Whole, and was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States in the State of Mississippi.

To that provision of the bill which fixes the salary of the district judge, as reported by the Judiciary Committee, Mr. POINDEXTER objected, and entered into several statements, exhibiting the arduous duties which would devolve on that officer, and the probable amount of his necessary expenses, to show that the provision proposed for him in the bill was inadequate; and that the subject might be again examined, and more correctly settled by the select committee, who could do so with more ease and facility than could be done in Committee of the Whole House, Mr. P. moved that the Committee rise, and report progress.

The Committee of the Whole then rose and reported progress, and, on the suggestion of Mr. POINDEXTER, was refused leave to sit again; and, on his motion, the bill was then recommitted to the Committee on the Judiciary.

INTEREST ON CLAIMS.

On motion of Mr. COLSTON, the House took up for consideration the bill in addition to the act for the relief of John Thompson, [authorizing a review of his claim formerly adjusted and settled, and the payment of such interest as may appear due.]

Some discussion took place on the subject, in which Messrs. COLSTON and RHEA warmly and at some length advocated the equity of the petitioner's right to interest on a claim so just as that on which it was founded.

Mr. HOPKINSON questioned the propriety of allowing the interest in this case, when it had been refused in others equally strong, and so often that it seemed to amount to a rule, and mentioned particularly the case of General St. Clair, who to this day was denied interest on money actually advanced out of his own pocket for the public use.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, denied that there was any rule on the subject, or that the practice of Congress was uniform in refusing interest, and he cited the case of the widow of the late Alexander Hamilton, who, not for money advanced by her husband, but only for services rendered, received interest on the amount of her claim.

Mr. COLSTON replied also to Mr. HOPKINSON, and quoted other examples in similar cases, to show that the practice of the House authorized this allowance.

Messrs. SHERWOOD, BAYLEY, WM. P. MACLAY, LIVERMORE, and OGLE, also took part in this discussion favorable to the petitioner; the two first-named gentlemen and the last speaking also on the subject of the case of General St. Clair, which had been incidentally introduced. Mr. OGLE, particularly, protested against the present occupation of the House, spending their time, he said, in hunting for some statute or some bar to the just claim of a man who had, in the Revolution, given all his worldly goods and a part of his blood in support of the independence of his country. And now, in 1817, and on the very last day of the year, after the lapse of so long a time, he was sorry to see the House engaged in searching for precedents to keep this veteran out of his just claim. For his part, Mr. O. said, if there was a statute as strong as brass itself, or as solid as the pillars of the Capitol, he would blow it to powder to do justice to a soldier of the Revolution, and that soldier, too, such a man as John Thompson. As to the case of the aged St. Clair, Mr. O. said that was a subject which ought not to be mentioned in this House in the face of day; the treatment of that man ought to be spoken of here only in the night.

The bill was finally ordered, nem. con., to be engrossed and read a third time.

JUDICIAL RECORDS.

After refusing successively to take up the bill to authorize expatriation, and the bill respecting the claims of the State of Georgia for militia services rendered in 1792 and 1793, the House went into a Committee of the Whole on the bill to prescribe the effect certain records and judicial proceedings of the Courts of each State shall have in every State, and in the Courts of the United States.

The bill received some amendments, and considerable discussion took place on its details, in which Messrs. PINDALL, STORRS, STRONG, of Massachusetts, H. NELSON, of Virginia, EDWARDS, BALDWIN, WHITMAN, LIVERMORE, SPENCER, and BEECHER joined.

After the Committee had spent some time on the subject, Mr. CLAY (Speaker) rose, and observing that as—either from its being the last day of the year or from some other cause, he knew not what—the House seemed less interested in this subject than its importance merited, moved that the Committee rise; which being agreed to, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again. And the House adjourned to Friday next.

FRIDAY, January 2, 1818.

Another member, to wit: from Massachusetts, TIMOTHY FULLER, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

mission and Colonization Society of North Carolina, praying that the plan at present before the National Legislature, for colonizing the free people of color of the United States, may be adopted and carried into effect.—Referred to the committee appointed on a petition from the representatives of the annual meeting of the Society of Friends, in Baltimore.

Mr. LOWNDES, from the Committee of Ways and Means, made a report on the petition of Purley Keyes, which was read; when Mr. L. reported a bill for the relief of Purley Keyes and Jason Fairbanks; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. WILLIAMS reported a bill for the relief of Abraham Byington; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. RHEA, from the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims, reported a bill to authorize the payment of certain certificates; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HERBERT, from the Committee for the District of Columbia, reported a bill to provide for the erection of a court-house, jail, and public offices, within the county of Alexandria, in the District of Columbia; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the Committee on the Judiciary, to which was recommitted the bill to provide for the due execution of the laws of the United States within the State of Mississippi, reported the same without amendment; and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole on Monday next.

Mr. HUGH NELSON, from the same committee, who was instructed to inquire into the expediency of altering the third section of the act to establish a government in the Territory of Alabama, made a report thereon; which was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON, from the same committee, who was instructed to inquire into the expediency of building offices for the safe-keeping of the records of the district courts, also made a report thereon; which was read and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. NELSON, from the same committee, who was instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the compensation of the marshal of the northern district of New York, made report, which was read, and the resolution therein contained was concurred in by the House, as follows:

Resolved, That it is not necessary to increase the compensation to the marshal of the northern district of New York.

On motion of Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, the Committee of Claims were instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing, by law, for extending the provisions of an act, entitled "An act, providing for the payment of claims for property lost, captured, or destroyed by the enemy, while in the military service of the United States, and for other purposes."

On motion of Mr. PINDALL, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of establishing a district court in Virginia, west of the Alleghany mountains.

The SPEAKER laid before the House, a letter from the Secretary of State, communicating his report on the petition of Richard Mitchell, jr. and others; which were read and ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. LIVERMORE, it was ordered that the Clerk procure to be printed for the use of this House, six hundred copies of a report, bearing date the 20th February, 1800, made by James McHenry, then Secretary of War, on the subject of claims of certain citizens of the State of Georgia, for compensation for military services rendered from the 23d of April, 1793, to the 25th of July, 1794, and all other reports of the Secretary of War on the same subject, together with the documents accompanying the said reports.

The following joint resolution, submitted by Mr. WHITMAN, was read twice and ordered to be engrossed and read a third time on Monday next:

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That thirty copies of the laws, passed at the first and second sessions of the Fourteenth Congress, remaining in the office of the Secretary of State, be by him deposited in the office of the Clerk of the House of Representatives for the use of the members thereof.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act in addition to the act, entitled "An act for the relief of John Thompson," was read the third time and passed.

An engrossed bill for the relief of John Anderson, was read a third time. [This bill proposes to allow to Colonel Anderson $400, being the amount of two judgments obtained against him for the estimated value of certain private property destroyed by his orders, in the discharge of his duty as an officer of the army, on the Northwestern frontier.]

This bill would have passed without debate, but that Mr. LOWNDES objected to its passing sub silentio, lest it might be brought into precedent hereafter, to justify the indemnification of officers for like judgments obtained against them, on the evidence of the judgment merely, without proof of the suits having been duly defended. This suggestion gave rise to an exposition of the circumstances of this claim by Messrs. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, MCCOY, WALKER, of Kentucky, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, BEECHER, and RICH; from which it appeared that the claim was one of unexceptionable character, and that ample evidence to that effect had been exhibited to the Committee of Claims. There was a motion to recommit the bill, which was negatived by a large majority; and the bill finally passed without opposition.

JUDICIAL RECORDS.

The House again resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prescribe the effect of certain records and judicial proceedings.

This bill, as reported by the Judicial Committee, at the instance of Mr. SPENCER, and verbally amended, provides—

"That the record of any final judgment or final decree, in any suit of any court of any State, when authenticated in the manner required by law, shall have the same effect given to it in every court of the United States, and of every other State, as such record would have by law or usage, if offered as evidence in any other court of the State from which the said record shall be taken: Provided, That no such record shall be deemed conclusive against the parties thereto, their heirs, executors, or administrators, or persons claiming under them, or either of them, unless it shall appear on the face of such record that the party against whom such record shall be alleged, his testator, intestate, ancestor, devisee, or grantor, had been personally served with process to compel his or their appearance, in the same suit and in the same court, or that such party had actually appeared in the same suit, and in the same court, before the rendition of the judgment or the passing of the decree: And provided, further, That no lien or charge shall be created, by any such final judgment or final decree upon any real or personal estate, situated out of the State at the time when such judgment was rendered or such decree was passed.

"Sec. 2. That whenever manupactors, or bail, or sureties for the personal appearance of any person, in any court of any State, shall produce to a judge or justice of some court of record in any other State, the recognizance of bail, or the copy of a bail-piece, or a copy of the instrument by which such manupactors, bail, or sureties, became bound, duly authenticated according to law, it shall be the duty of such judge or justice to certify, upon some part of such recognizance, or copy of a bail-piece, or instrument as aforesaid, that the same is duly authenticated according to law, and thereupon to endorse the same with his own proper hand, with the date of doing so; which certificate and endorsement, with the recognizance, or copy of a bail-piece, or instrument as aforesaid, shall have the same effect to authorize the said manupactors, bail, or sureties, to arrest and take their principal to such other State, and remove him to such place as shall be proper and necessary, for the purpose of surrendering him in their discharge, as the said recognizance, copy of a bail-piece, or other instrument as aforesaid, might or could have by law or usage in the State where such bail was given."

The amendment moved by Mr. STRONG, when the subject was last under discussion, having been withdrawn—

Mr. CONN proposed to amend the bill, so as that all judgments of one State, carried to another State, should be regarded as foreign judgments, and not entitled to the effect they would have in the State in which they may have been rendered.

This motion Mr. C. supported by a variety of remarks and illustrations of the different effects of judgments in the different States, which would produce involvement, and frequently injustice, under the provisions of the bill as it now stands.

Mr. SPENCER opposed the amendment, as going to change the whole principle of the bill. In vindicating the object and the details of the bill, the principal benefit he anticipated from it was, that it would give a confidence and extent to the commercial credit of the country, which it now wanted from the absence of some such provision, which was a great impediment to the increase of the trade between the Atlantic cities and the western country; the merchant fearing to credit, from apprehended difficulty in the recovery of his debts. If, however, Mr. S. took occasion to say, the passage of this bill had no other effect, it would have the important effect of compelling the parties going with records from one State into another, to make them more formal, and in some measure to correct the loose manner in which too generally the proceedings of our courts are now conducted.

Mr. COBB defended the amendment, and replied generally to Mr. SPENCER, and, particularly, that the formality of proceedings, on which that gentleman had predicated the bill, did not prevail to any extent in the country, particularly in the southern and western States, and that therefore the bill, as it now stands, might occasionally have an improper operation.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of Connecticut, opposed the amendment moved by Mr. COBB. It was not only the dictate of reason, but, he argued, conformable to the spirit and almost to the letter of the Constitution, that judgments obtained in one State should not be mere prima facie evidence in another. It was an extraordinary doctrine, he argued, that the decisions of the courts of one State should have no more effect in another, and be no more recognised, than the decisions of any petty foreign court, constituted we know not how—founded on the opinions of we know not whom. The intention of the Constitution was, he contended, and such was the construction formally given to it by the Supreme Court—that the decision of a State Court should be conclusive between the parties, as well in one State as in another.

After some other debate, the question was taken on the amendment, and decided in the negative.

Mr. BALDWIN, expressing himself of the opinion that the same weight ought not to be given to every description of record, moved to amend the bill by striking out the first section, and inserting, in lieu thereof, the following, in which he said he had hastily embodied his ideas of what the law ought to be:

"That the record of any final judgment or decree, given or rendered after the personal service of process on the defendant or defendants, or his or their appearance in any suit of any court of record or chancery of the United States, or of any State or Territory, when authenticated in the manner required by law, shall be prima facie evidence of all matters therein contained in every court of the United States, and of every other State and Territory, in any suit, action, or bill brought thereon. And if such judgment or decree shall be rendered after trial by jury, or a hearing on the merits of the cause, then such record shall be conclusive evidence of all the matters and things therein contained in the courts of the United States, or of any State or Territory, in any suit, action, or bill, brought to recover the sum awarded, or the performance of the act or thing adjudged, awarded, or decreed in the judgment or decree originally rendered."

Mr. SPENCER considered this amendment as so essentially varying the bill that he would scarcely object, were it not that the gentleman had acknowledged it to have been hastily penned, and, this bill, he assured him, had been draughted with care and attention. He hoped the gentleman would be prevailed on to withdraw his motion.

At this stage of the proceedings, on motion of Mr. DESHA, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

PENSIONS TO WOUNDED OFFICERS.

The following resolution, submitted by Mr. COMSTOCK, was read and committed to the Committee of the Whole to which is committed the resolutions submitted by Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, on the 9th of December last:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide, by law, for placing on the pension list the officers of the Army who have been wounded in battle during the late war with Great Britain.

Mr. COMSTOCK said he did not rise to say much on the resolution he had just had the honor to present. He did not think the occasion required him to go into the subject at any considerable length. But he deemed some explanation of the motives which had induced him to this measure, due to the subject, to the House, and to himself. He hoped, therefore, to be indulged while he proceeded to make a few observations. The House, he said, had not yet to learn that wounded officers of the Army were not placed on the pension list by common usage and design. If a contrary practice had, in a few instances, obtained, as he was informed it had, and some wounded officers of the Army were found on the pension-roll, the fact could be accounted for only in this way: A few wounded officers had availed themselves of the pension laws before the reduction of the Army, shortly after the close of the war. When this reduction was made, a very small number of these were retained in service; no reference having, he presumed, been had, on this occasion, to the list of pensioners. Mr. Speaker, said Mr. C., the services and sufferings of the Revolutionary officers and soldiers have ever been duly appreciated by the people and by their Representatives. It would be casting a dishonorable imputation upon the virtuous and enlightened citizens of the United States, to suppose that they could be unconscious of the exalted merit of those who have endured for them nakedness, starvation, and toil, and braved so many dangers in fighting their battles. Nor did they brave only the dangers of the field; they subjected themselves to the fate of rebels, had the contest been disastrous. Their conduct must have called down upon them the unmingled fury of the regal Government under which they were held. It is true, indeed, said he, that the Revolutionary officers and soldiers have not, in all cases, been sufficiently rewarded. This has been owing partly to the want of means in the Government, and partly, he feared, to an improper procrastination. But I rejoice, said Mr. C., that the day of retribution has at length arrived. On the recommendation of a President whose blood was freely shed in the arduous contest which established our independence, and inspired with the sentiments and feelings of the venerable reporter and advocate of a bill to reward the few survivors of that contest, we are about to accord to them that assistance which they need, and to which they are entitled by every principle of justice and of gratitude. Mr. C. said he anxiously improved this auspicious period in our history, to invite the House to the subject in question. Mr. Speaker, continued he, it will be recollected that a proposition was made a few sessions since, to bestow a gratuity in land upon the officers of the late army, according to their respective grades.

Some honorable gentlemen were, at that time, unwilling to confer this gratuity, without discrimination, upon those officers who entered the Army just before the termination of hostilities, and who had been constantly employed in the recruiting service, as well as upon those who had endured the privations and perils of the field, in rendering long and signal service to their country. None were found, I believe, said Mr. C., that felt disposed to withhold the bounty of their Government from the latter class of officers; all were ready to reward exalted merit. For myself, said he, it would ever gratify the finest feelings of my heart to aid the passage of any law necessary to do them justice. This, however, said he, may be considered a digression; he merely suggested it to show that no such objection could be sustained against the resolution, or against a bill of which it might be the foundation. The wounded officers of your army have manifested the physical and moral qualities necessary in the soldier. They have largely shared the sufferings and dangers incident to their profession. They have not wasted their time in the pleasures of the ball room, and in the amusements of fashionable circles, remote from fatigue, alarm, and conflicts. They have relinquished their employments and professions, sacrificed their means of acquiring wealth, and, foregoing the endearments of domestic life, have sought the tened field. They have met your enemy, trodden the bloody arena, sustained your eagles, and achieved victory in the jaws of death. They have borne from the plain of battle the laurels of conquest; but have returned, seamed with scars, disfigured by frightful wounds, or deprived of their limbs. In these consist their pretensions as soldiers. In these they exhibit the mournful, yet proud, monuments of their valor and devotion to their country. When contemplating this subject, said Mr. C., a number of names are presented to my view, which I will beg leave to pronounce in your hearing. Among the wounded officers of your army, I behold the names of Majors Larabee, Wetmore, and Birdsall, with Lieutenants Shaler and Wilcox. Major Larabee lost his left arm at the battle of Brownstown, under the command of General Miller. This General, distinguished in so many engagements, I leave, said Mr. C., to the pen of the faithful historian; suffice it to say that his fame is more imperishable than brass or marble. The sensation which the battle of Brownstown produced throughout the Union can never be forgotten.

H. OF R.

Pensions to Wounded Officers.

JANUARY, 1818.

Our affairs, at that time, wore rather an unfavorable aspect. When dangers thickened around his Spartan band, their unconquerable spirit rose commensurate with the crisis. They manifested a contempt for danger, and an invincible determination to conquer or to die. They attacked and routed the allied forces of the enemy, drove them from their lodgments, and left the field in triumph. Some of our countrymen were slain; but with the loss of an arm Major Larabee survived, and has ever since continued in the service. The amputation of his limb has not lessened his usefulness. The reports of the Army sufficiently evince his active service. Major Wetmore lost his right arm, in a bold and dangerous enterprise, on the Niagara station, in the first campaign, under the command of an honorable gentleman of this House. Though he has lost a most useful member, he has lost none of that proud sensibility which characterizes the American soldier. He has constantly served, with honorable distinction, in various capacities in the Army. I think, said Mr. C., that I was introduced to this young man when he could reach to me his right hand in the salutation of friendship; but this he can do no more forever. Major Birdsall was dreadfully wounded in the face when the night assault was made on Fort Erie. It had become his duty to dislodge the enemy from the momentary possession of that bastion which was afterwards blown up. A few moments after this awful catastrophe, when he was standing on a twenty-four pounder, very near this fatal spot, dispensing orders to his troops, and cheering them to victory, a ball entered his mouth, carried off almost one half of his lower jaw, and lodged in the lateral and hinder part of the neck. It has, very recently, been extracted. Language cannot express the sufferings he had sustained. Repeated and extensive ulcerations had supervened. The left shoulder, from the continuity of its parts with those wounded and ulcerated, had fallen below its natural position. The dressings for the wound must be removed and renewed several times a day; certainly as often as food is taken, and sometimes more frequently. The constant oozing of the saliva, through the unclosed wound, soon wets not only the dressings, but also the collar and cravat. But, sir, said Mr. C., I must not be too technical and minute in description upon this occasion. We see, however, that sufferings, expense, and trouble have not driven Major Birdsall from the service. He continues, with his acknowledged zeal and ability, to discharge its duties with universal approbation. With Lieutenants Shaler and Wilcox, who were wounded in the campaign of 1814, I have not, said he, the pleasure to be acquainted, nor do I know their particular history. But they are in the Army; and their wounds clearly indicate that they have sought the post of honor, and challenged the esteem and reward of their country. The former has lost his left, and the latter his right arm.

But, Mr. Speaker, the allowing of an officer pay and pension at the same time, may be conceived inadmissible. It may be said, that an officer entitled to a full pension according to his rank must be totally disabled, and by consequence incompetent to afford efficient service to his country. Mr. C. said, the words "total disability," used in the pension laws, are indefinite in their meaning. The phrase, he said, was obviously relative. If the words were taken in their most extensive and unqualified sense, they would import death itself, or something approaching near that state. For, if a man possessed only a very small share of corporeal and mental power, he could exercise it in some way towards procuring a livelihood. Nevertheless, an officer deprived of an arm, leg, or eye, is totally disabled in the view of the laws, judging from the interpretation they have received in practice, and is therefore entitled to a full pension, in proportion to his grade. But will it be contended that these injuries, essential as they are, disqualify an officer to discharge the duties devolved upon him? I trust not, sir, said Mr. C. I do not conceive that the being able to shoulder a barrel of cider, or to chop off logs, is an important qualification in an officer. Lord Nelson did not possess the physical ability necessary to accomplish such things when he fought those battles that have ranked him among the most illustrious of naval heroes, and gilded the pages of British history.

Sir, said Mr. C., would a pension make the condition of the officers I have named more eligible than if they had never been wounded? Surely not. What value shall be put on the wounds of these officers? What is the amount of the inconvenience, expense, and torture, which they have borne, and continue to sustain? Would they have bartered their active limbs for a pension? No, sir; they risked more than their limbs, when, inspired by nobler motives, they took up arms and fought for their country! Their talents and good conduct have continued them in the Army. They are able to serve you in peace or in war; and, should you place them on the pension roll, how can it be shown that this act of sheer justice ought to exclude them from a participation in military employment and promotion?

Mr. Speaker, the war is ended; the din of arms does not continue to salute our ears; our eyes are no longer pained with beholding garments rolled in blood. We are prone to forget these things; but the wounded soldier, and those who depend on him for protection and support, have much reason to remember them. Though our wounded officers of the Army are not disqualified for military service, their habits, and the loss of former business and employments, have disqualified them for other pursuits.

Mr. Speaker, let us accord honor and assistance to the brave!

"All things are common, but the warrior's fame:
That glows eternal in the mouths of men."

In anniversary orations and songs we are called "a band of brothers." Let us evince by our conduct the sincerity of our fraternal affection. I am unwilling to join in these professions, if they are unmeaning. It is not enough to say to a naked and hungry brother, "Be thou clothed and fed." Tears of sympathy should bedew our cheeks, and streams of munificence should issue from our hands. Sir, said Mr. C., it is not among the least blessings of a republican Government that its burdens are equally borne, and its advantages equally enjoyed. Let us, Mr. Speaker, do equal and exact justice to every class of citizens. Then our free institutions, based in the affections of the people, shall manifest to the latest ages the memorials of Columbian wisdom and valor. I hope, said Mr. C., that the resolution will be referred, and that something may result from it beneficial to the wounded officers of the Army, and honorable to the nation. I hope that Government will at least place them above embarrassment, and enable them to support themselves, and those whom Providence may have committed to their care and protection. It must gratify every benevolent heart to see the children of the wounded defenders of their country's rights enjoying those social advantages which the gallantry of their fathers has nobly contributed to secure and perpetuate.

Adjourned to Monday.

MONDAY, JANUARY 5.

Mr. ROBERTSON presented the petition of the Mayor Aldermen and inhabitants of the city of New Orleans, praying, that in any sale of the vacant and unimproved grounds, within the said city, their rights may be respected, by reserving from sale such parts thereof, as have been, from the first settlement of the place used in common for the health and convenience of the inhabitants of said city.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a list of persons who have been placed on the pension roll of the United States, transmitted in obedience to a resolution of the 17th ultimo; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting a list of persons who have been added to the pension list of the United States since the 28th of May, 1813, transmitted in obedience to a resolution of the 18th ultimo; which was ordered to lie on the table.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting an account of moneys transferred during the late recess of Congress, from one specific appropriation to another, showing the application of the same; which was referred to the Committee on Public Expenditures.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House, a letter from the Secretary of War, transmitting statements of the expenditure and application of all such moneys as have been drawn from the Treasury by him, for the year ending 30th September, 1817; which was ordered to lie on the table.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed a bill, entitled "An act for the relief of William Edwards and John G. Stubbs," in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

An engrossed resolution "Directing the procurement of certain laws," was read the third time, and passed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the Committee on Public Lands, who were instructed to inquire into the expediency of advancing the price at which the public lands are held for sale, made a report on that subject, concluding with a recommendation to the House to adopt the following resolution:

Resolved, That it is inexpedient at the present time to increase the price of those public lands required to be sold.

The report was read, and ordered to lie on the table.

Mr. ROBERTSON, from the same committee, to whom was referred the petition of Edmund Dana, and others, praying to be allowed to purchase a considerable body of public lands on certain accommodating terms, reported unfavorably there-to. The report was read, and concurred in.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the Committee on Foreign Relations, reported a bill in addition to the act for the punishment of certain crimes against the United States, and to repeal the acts therein mentioned. The bill was twice read.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, from the select committee appointed to consider the subject, reported a bill allowing compensation to the members of the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States.—[The bill fixes the compensation at the rate of nine dollars per diem, and nine dollars for every twenty miles travelling to and from Congress.] The bill was twice read, and committed.

Mr. FLOYD, of Virginia, from a select committee, reported a bill to extend the privilege of franking to the vaccine agents of States and Territories, which was twice read, and committed.

Mr. JOHNSON offered for consideration the following resolutions:

Resolved, That the committee on the subject of the militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for organizing the general staff of the militia of the several States, upon the principle of the general staff of the Army of the United States, as far as practicable.

Resolved, That the committee on the subject of the militia be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law a system of military discipline for the militia of the several States and Territories.

Mr. JOHNSON said, it was generally known that a very great and radical difference existed between the militia staff and the staff of the Army of the United States; and he was anxious to bring the question before the committee on the subject of the militia, that one might be made to conform to the other as far as practicable. There was another subject of great importance, in his opinion, and that was the want of some uniform system of military discipline for the militia of the several States. For, within a very few years, the Army of the United States had been governed in its discipline by Steuben, by Duane's Infantry and Riflemen, by Smyth's Infantry, and now by a late compilation by a court martial, which applies chiefly to the infantry discipline. In the meantime, no regular system had been adopted for the militia, and he thought it was time that we should discharge the duty imposed upon Congress by the Constitution of the United States, by fixing upon a mode of uniform discipline for the militia of the several States.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, moved that the Committee on the Post Office and Post Roads be instructed to inquire into the expediency of increasing the salary of the Postmaster General.

Mr. J. said, he looked at the great responsibility and increasing duties of this officer, and he was anxious to bring the subject before the proper committee; that many years had elapsed since the salary was fixed at its present rate. It was well known that the Postmaster General had the appointment of postmasters in various parts of the United States, amounting to nearly the number of four thousand; that the contractors and other agents appointed and selected by him amounted to about one thousand; and the revenue, independently of defraying the expense of the establishment, had averaged about one hundred and fifty thousand dollars per annum. In making this motion, Mr. J. said, he looked to these important duties, and the high responsibility of the Postmaster General; but had he taken into consideration the personal merits of the officer, and his faithful discharge of his various duties, his opinion would be confirmed, that no officer in the Government was entitled to greater consideration by the House.

On motion of Mr. MIDDLETON, the Committee on the Judiciary were instructed to inquire into the expediency of making compensation by law to the honorable William Johnson, jr., one of the associate judges of the United States, for extra services, he was called upon to perform during the inability of the late district judge of South Carolina.

The engrossed bill to incorporate the Columbian Insurance Company of Alexandria, was read a third time, and passed.

OHIO CONTESTED ELECTION.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee on Elections, to whom was referred the petition of C. Hammond, contesting the election of Mr. HERRICK, a member of this House from the State of Ohio, on the ground of his having held an office under the United States, subsequent to the fourth day of March last, made a report; which was read, and referred to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

That on the 19th December, 1810, Mr. Herrick was appointed Attorney of the United States for the district of Ohio, which office he accepted, and held until his resignation thereof, on the 29th November, 1817. In October, 1816, he was elected one of the Representatives of the State of Ohio, for the Fifteenth Congress. The result of the election was publicly announced on the 7th January, 1817, in the presence of the Senate of that State. On the 15th September, 1817, the Governor executed a certificate of Mr. Herrick's election, according to the law of Ohio, which was received by him on or about the 30th day of the same month. Mr. Herrick, therefore, continued in office almost nine months after the fourth of March last, and two months after receiving the certificate of his election. It does not appear, on the part of the memorialist, and it is denied, on the part of Mr. Herrick, that he performed any act as Attorney of the United States, after the said 30th September. He, however, continued in office, was liable to perform its duties, and was entitled to its salary, until his resignation. Congress met December 1, 1817, and Mr. Herrick took his seat, on that day, in the House of Representatives.

The 6th section of the first article of the Constitution provides, that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House, during his continuance in office." The incompatibility is not limited to exercising an office, and at the same time, being a member of either House of Congress; but it is equally extended to the case of holding; that is, having, keeping, possessing, or retaining, an office, under such circumstances. If the membership of Mr. Herrick commenced either on the 4th of March or the 30th of September, 1817, he has vacated that membership by holding an office incompatible therewith.

We do not find that the question of incompatibility has been agitated in the House of Representatives on more than two occasions. The first case was that of John P. Van Ness, which occurred during the second session of the Seventh Congress. The Committee of Elections were then instructed to inquire whether Mr. Van Ness, one of the Representatives from the State of New York, had not, after his election, and after he had occupied a seat of a member, accepted and exercised the office of a major of militia, under the authority of the United States, within the Territory of Columbia. Mr. Van Ness freely admitted the fact, as alleged, and thereupon the House unanimously resolved that he had thereby forfeited his right to a seat as a member of the House.

The other case was that of Philip Barton Key, decided at the first session of the Tenth Congress. Mr. Key's seat was impeached, among other grounds, upon this: that, at the time of his election, and until a few days, either before or after he took his seat, he held, from the British Government, in his own right and name, the half-pay pension of a captain of infantry. The facts were briefly these: Mr. Key served as an officer in the British army, without the limits of the United States, from 1778 until 1783, when the corps to which he belonged was disbanded, and the officers placed on half-pay. The pension was paid, either for the benefit of himself or his assignee, until the month of December, 1805, when he received six months half-pay: in January, 1806, he wrote to his agent in London, directing him to resign his claim to half-pay, and also to rank, if any could be supposed to exist; but it did not appear that anything had been done in pursuance of that letter, nor indeed that it ever had been received by his agent.

On the 6th of October, 1806, Mr. Key was elected a Representative of the State of Maryland, for two years, commencing on the fourth of March, 1807. On the 24th of October following, he addressed a letter to Mr. Erskine, then His Britannic Majesty's Ambassador at Washington, referring to the letter written to his agent, and repeating his resignation in a formal manner. This letter was not delivered to Mr. Erskine until the 28th or 29th of October, which was two or three days after the meeting of Congress, and after Mr. Key had taken his seat in the House of Representatives. Upon these facts the House decided that Mr. Key was entitled to his seat.

In regard to the several cases of Messrs. Turner, Dawson, and others, mentioned in the answer marked C, filed by Mr. Holmes, on the part of Mr. Herrick, we think a single remark sufficient. It does not appear that the House of Representatives was made acquainted with the existence of these cases. It cannot, therefore, be considered to have acquiesced in that of which it was ignorant.

The decisions of the House of Commons, under the statutes 5 William and Mary, chap. 7; 11 William III., chap. 2; and 12 and 13 William III., chap. 10, may serve to shed some light upon the subject under consideration. The first of these statutes enacts that no member of the House of Commons shall, at any time, be concerned, directly or indirectly, or any other in trust for him, in the framing, collecting, or managing, any of the duties granted by that or any future act of Parliament, except the commissioners of the Treasury, and the officers and commissioners for managing the customs and excise. The second act extends the disqualification to officers of the excise, declaring them incapable of sitting, voting, or acting as members; and the last mentioned act applies the same provisions to all officers of the customs.

Many members of the House of Commons were, at different times, expelled for violations of these statutes; but the facts are reported in terms so general, that it is impossible in most cases to determine whether the offence was committed before or after the member took his seat in the House. We find, however, two cases where the particulars are stated. The first case was decided on the 13th February, 1698, under the act above mentioned of the 5 William and Mary. It is the case of Mr. Montagu; and it is stated as follows by Hatsell, in his precedents of proceedings in the House of Commons. The new Parliament was made returnable on the 24th of August, 1698, and was directed to sit for the despatch of business on the 29th of November. Mr. Montagu had been a commissioner of stamp duties, but, in the commission which passed in September, 1698, he was left out; it appeared that he had acted under the former commission till the 4th of October, 1698. But, having informed the House that he did not qualify himself as a member till the 29th of November, and so conceived himself not to be within the law, he is, upon the question, called in to take his place, and a committee is appointed to draw up and state the matter of fact. It does not appear that the committee ever made report.

The other case is reported as follows: On the 5th of February, 1708, Sir Richard Allen was, on the hearing of his petition, declared to be duly elected for Dunwich. On the 7th of February he surrendered an office in the customs for life, to which he had been appointed in May, 1678. On the 8th of February, this surrender is enrolled, and on the 9th of February, he desires the sense of the House, before he takes his seat, on the clause of the 12 and 13 of William III., chap.

10, which relates to the officers of the customs: and, upon reading the letters patent and surrender, he is permitted to take his seat.

Persons elected to the House of Commons become at one time members for certain purposes, and at another time for other purposes. Thus, immediately upon executing the indenture of return by the sheriff or other returning officer, the person elected becomes entitled to the privilege of franking, although the day at which the Parliament is made returnable may not have arrived. Yet he is not a member, for he may thereafter be a candidate for election in another district, at any time before the Parliament is made returnable, and the return actually filed in the Crown Office. From the time last mentioned, he becomes a member so far that he cannot be a candidate for another district, but yet may thereafter hold an office incompatible with membership, and upon resigning his office, he may immediately qualify and take his seat in the House. It has often been decided by their Committee of Elections, that a person holding an office incompatible with membership is, nevertheless, capable of prosecuting his claim to a seat. After examination of all the Parliamentary registers, histories, and journals within our reach, we have found no case where a person elected to the House of Commons was brought in on a call of the House, before he had voluntarily appeared, qualified, and taken his seat, nor do we find any instance of a person having been expelled until after such time.

A very particular case occurred on the 10th of February, 1620: Sir John Leech having been duly elected a member of the House of Commons, and appearing to take the oaths of allegiance and supremacy, was asked, whether he had not already sat in the house of that Parliament, in violation of the statute. He confessed that, on the Wednesday morning previous, he did sit in the House a quarter of an hour being unsworn. For this offence Sir John was not expelled, but it was resolved that he was disabled to serve in the House; and a new writ of election was issued to supply the vacancy, in the same manner as if no election and return had taken place. The same course of proceeding has been pursued when a person, duly elected and returned, comes into the house and refuses to be sworn. Such was the case of Mr. Archdale, in the year 1698, who, being elected and returned, came into the House of Commons and said, he was ready to serve if his affirmation of allegiance could be accepted instead of his oath. The House resolved that it could not. Mr. Archdale, still declining to take the oath, was refused admittance to a seat, and a new writ was issued to supply his place. This case is more peculiar, because a person elected to the House of Commons, cannot relinquish his right to a seat either before or after qualification, otherwise than by accepting an incompatible office. But by refusing to be sworn, he may do that indirectly which he is not permitted to do directly. We have seen several similar cases which occurred in the Colonial Assembly of New York, but not now having access to the journals, we are unable to report the particulars.

Persons elected and returned to the House of Commons may be chosen members of committees before they appear and qualify. But it is allowed for a reason similar to that which, in courts of law, permits a declaration to be filed de bene esse before the defendant appears in court. In both cases the act is conditional; and it is ineffectual, unless the condition of appearance be performed.

The practice of this House, which does not allow the appointment of persons to be members of committees, until they shall have taken their seats, is obviously more reasonable and convenient than the other. It was decided, as early as the first session of the second Congress, in the case of John F. Mercer, who was chosen to supply a vacancy in the representation of the State of Maryland, occasioned by the resignation of William Pinkney, that a representative elect might decline his election before taking a seat, and before the first session of the Congress to which he was elected. We do not find that the question has since been agitated, although similar cases have often occurred. Our rule in this particular is different from that of the House of Commons; it is also better, for it makes our theory conform to what is fact in both countries, that the act of becoming in reality a member of the House, depends wholly upon the person elected and returned. Election does not of itself constitute membership, although the period may have arrived at which the Congressional term commences. This is evident from the consideration, that all the votes given at an election may not be received by the returning officer in season to be counted, whereby a person not elected may be returned, and take the seat of one who was duly elected. Neither does a return necessarily confer membership, for if he in whose favor it be made should be prevented taking a seat at the organization of a House of Representatives, he might find, upon presenting himself to qualify, that his return has been superseded by the admission of another person into the seat for which he was returned.

At an election, held in the State of Georgia, in October, 1804, Thomas Spalding was duly chosen a Representative to the Ninth Congress; but because the votes of three counties were not returned to the Governor, within twenty days after the election, Cowles Mead received a certificate, and took his seat. Mr. Spalding afterwards presented his petition. The House vacated Mr. Mead's seat, and admitted Mr. Spalding.

In April, 1814, Doctor Willoughby was elected a Representative of the State of New York, to the Fourteenth Congress; but by reason of a clerical error, of certain inspectors, in returning certificates of votes to the office of the county clerk, General Smith was declared duly elected, and a certificate of election was accordingly delivered to him; but he having omitted to take a seat at the commencement of the session was, on the ninth day thereafter, declared not entitled, and thereupon Doctor Willoughby was admitted in his stead.

Several other cases might be cited where persons were returned, who never in fact became members, and where others became members who were not returned. Neither do election and return create membership. These acts are nothing more than the designation of the individual, who, when called upon in the manner prescribed by law, shall be authorized to claim title to a seat. This designation, however, does not confer a perfect right, for a person may be selected by the people destitute of certain qualifications, without which he cannot be admitted to a seat. He is, nevertheless, so far the representative of those who elect him, that no vacancy can exist until his disqualification be adjudged by the House. Yet it would be easy to state cases where he would not be permitted for a moment to occupy a seat, notwithstanding the regularity of his election and return. To no practical purpose could he ever have been a member. So also if a person duly qualified be elected and returned, and die before the organization of a House of Representatives, we do not think he could be said to have been a member of that body, which had no existence until after his death. We say which had no existence; for we consider that conceit altogether fanciful which represents one Congress succeeding to another as members of the same corporation. It has no foundation either in fact or in the theory of our Government. Each House of Representatives is a distinct legislative body, having no connexion with any preceding one. It commences its existence unrestrained by any rules or regulations for the conducting of business, which were established by former Houses, and which were binding upon them. It prescribes its own course of proceeding, elects its officers, and designates their duties. Even joint rules for the government of both Houses of Congress, are not binding upon a new House of Representatives, unless expressly established by it. Although the Fourteenth Congress had never assembled, the Fifteenth would have met under the Constitution, clothed with every legislative power, as amply as it was enjoyed by the Thirteenth. The Constitution does not define the time for which Representatives shall be chosen. It is satisfied, provided the choice take place at any time in every second year. The rest is left to the discretion of each State. Accordingly, in some States Representatives are usually chosen for one year and seven months, and in other States for a longer time.

The privilege of exemption from arrest, granted by the Constitution to Representatives before a meeting of the House and after its adjournment, furnishes no argument in favor of their membership at such times. Exemption from arrest is a privilege as old as the Parliament of England. There it is extended not only to members, but to their servants, horses, and carriages. Our Constitution adopts the very words of the common law, but restricts the privilege to members. In both countries the object is the same, not the benefit of the member, but of the public service. It is an essential incident to the right of being represented, and a consequence of that right. But that membership is not coextensive with the enjoyment of that privilege is manifest, from the consideration that such a construction might make the members of one Congress continue in office, not only after the Congress had expired, but also after the next Congress was actually in session. This construction, therefore, is not only absurd, but it serves to illustrate the fallacy of that suggestion which fancies the Representatives of one Congress succeeding to the seats of their predecessors as members of the same corporate body.

The privileges of franking letters and exemption from militia duty, are not granted by the Constitution. They are established by law, and liable to be changed at the will of the Government. They have been extended and may be restricted as public convenience shall require. Previous to the last Congress, the privilege of franking was not enjoyed until after the commencement of each session. But as that does not prove negatively that persons elected to the House of Representatives, were not members before that time; so the existing law does not prove affirmatively that they are. It is true that the words "members of the House of Representatives," are used as descriptive of the persons to whom the privilege is granted, but it certainly was used without intending thereby to express an opinion, much less to decide, when membership commences, and probably without in any wise advertent to that inquiry. The late war had created claims in every part of the country, which it was found convenient to send by mail to those who were elected to Congress in the several districts, previous to their leaving home. The law was passed with a view to the convenience of these public claimants, as well as to that of the Representatives elected. We have seen that in England this privilege is enjoyed before the commencement of membership, and probably for a reason similar to that abovementioned.

It is not now necessary to inquire what construction ought to be given to the act which exempts "members of both Houses of Congress" from the performance of militia duty. We do not know that it has ever received a judicial exposition, and we presume that the practice under it, by the officers of the militia, furnishes no very high authority on the Constitutional question before us.

In regard to the danger apprehended from Executive influence in the concerns of legislation, we might rest satisfied with the remark that the business of forming a constitution is not confided to us; ours is a more humble duty, it is to expound the text by a fair interpretation; we can neither add nor diminish; the object of our inquiry is, not what ought to be, but what is.

Whoever looks into the Constitution will find provisions to guard the entrance of the legislative hall against those whose personal and immediate interest would be advanced, by perpetuating offices and increasing salaries; but he will find none for the purpose of excluding the influence of Executive patronage. The framers of the Constitution either did not apprehend danger from that source, or they thought it impracticable to prevent it without hazarding still greater mischief. The great offices of the Union are objects of high and honorable ambition; they are left as open to the members of this House as to others, and they can only be obtained through Executive favor. Nay, laws may be passed on the last day of a Congress creating offices and fixing their salaries, and on the next day the members, by whose votes they were created, may be appointed to fill them. The only antidote provided against an abuse of this pervading influence is the elective franchise. No dependant on the Executive can take a seat in this House. If any member become such, his seat is vacated, his power returns to the people. By a faithful and intelligent exercise of it, they may correct errors and punish delinquency. This is the regenerating principle of the Constitution. If this remedy fail, it will be in vain to look for another. The Constitution was provided for a brave, wise, and virtuous people. If the citizens of the United States ever cease to deserve this character, our present political institutions will be found unsuited to their condition. This is the only Constitutional answer we can give to the suggestion of possible danger from Executive influence.

In fine, we have examined the memorial of Mr. Hammond with deliberate attention, and are of opinion that Mr. Herrick has not rendered himself incapable of being a member of this House, by reason of having held the office of Attorney of the United States after the 4th of March and until the 29th of November last. We subjoin hereto the said memorial marked A, Mr. Herrick's answer, marked B, and also an answer filed by Mr. Holmes on the part of Mr. Herrick, marked C, and respectfully submit the following resolution:

Resolved, That Samuel Herrick is entitled to a seat in this House.

The following is the petitioner's memorial:

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled.

The memorial of the undersigned, a citizen of the United States, and a resident and elector in the fourth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, respectfully represents:

That at the general election held in the State of Ohio, in the month of October, in the year 1816, Samuel Herrick, Esq., was duly elected to represent the fourth Congressional district of the State of Ohio, in the Fifteenth Congress of the United States. That on the 7th of January, 1817, agreeably to the laws of said State, he was declared duly elected by the Governor and Secretary of State, in the presence of the Senate of said State. That he has obtained a certificate of his election, has appeared and taken the oaths required by law, and now holds and occupies a seat in your honorable body, as one of the Representatives of the State of Ohio.

Your memorialist further sheweth, that, at the time Mr. Herrick was elected a member of the House of Representatives, he held the office of United States district attorney for the Ohio district, which office Mr. Herrick continued to hold, and continued to perform the duties thereof, and to receive the compensation attached thereto, until the month of September, in the year 1817; nor is it known to your memorialist that Mr. Herrick has yet resigned the said office.

Your memorialist further sheweth, that the office of United States district attorney is an office created by a law of the United States, and the persons appointed to discharge the duties of said office are nominated and appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate of the United States, and hold their offices during the pleasure of the President, and, besides perquisites of office, receive an annual compensation from the Treasury of the United States.

Your memorialist further sheweth, that by the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, it is, among other things, provided and declared that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House (of Congress) during his continuance in office."

It is conceived that the Congress of the United States is a political institution of continual duration. Composed of the President, the Senate, and the House of Representatives, it must always be in existence while the Government exists. The members of all its component parts, though appointed for different, are still appointed for determinate periods. The moment the term of the predecessor expires, that of the successor commences, unless for some cause such successor had not been elected in the manner pointed out by the Constitution. The commencement of every term is upon the 4th of March, that of the President every fourth, that of the Senate every sixth, and that of the House of Representatives every second year. And although it may possibly happen that the seat of a single member, or the representation of one or more States, may be vacant, yet this fact cannot possibly affect the continual existence of the institution itself, for if the Congress once ceases to exist, the Government must from that instant be terminated.

As the members of the House of Representatives are appointed for but two years, and the other branches are appointed for a longer period, the election of a new House of Representatives is considered as constituting a new Congress. The present Congress is denominated the 15th Congress of the United States : but this description must be referred to the members who compose the Congress, and not to the institution itself. Though, at the end of the biennial term of the Representatives, that branch of the Congress becomes necessarily disorganized ; still the Congress exists. The other branches are in complete organization, and the members of the representative branch are legally in existence, ready to be organized should occasion require it.

All the rights and all the privileges of their station attach to the members elect, the moment their term commences. There can be no space of time between the termination of one Congress and the commencement of another. The Fifteenth Congress existed on the 4th of March, 1817, as certainly as it now exists. The members of the Senate and of the House then elected, but who had not qualified themselves to act by taking the necessary oaths, were, notwithstanding this fact, members of Congress. The terms of Mr. Otis, in the Senate, and of Mr. Herrick, in the House, commenced at the same instant of time. Both were members: the President's proclamation convening the Senate, called Mr. Otis to the immediate performance of his duties ; but it could not constitute him a member of Congress. A proclamation convening the House of Representatives would have operated in the same manner upon Mr. Herrick ; and certainly, notwithstanding that the States of Virginia and North Carolina had omitted to appoint their representation, the President could have called the Fifteenth Congress to meet upon the 4th day of March, 1817.

An opinion seems to have prevailed, that a person elected a member of Congress is not, in fact, a member until he shall have declared his acceptance of the appointment, by taking the oaths necessary to qualify him to discharge his duties on the floor. This opinion assumes that, although the appointment is complete, and the term commenced, still the seat remains vacant until the person appointed shall signify his pleasure upon the subject. This position is regarded as wholly untenable.

Either Mr. Herrick was a member of Congress on the 4th of March, 1817, or he was not a member. If he was a member, there could be no vacancy ; if he was not a member, by what authority does he now occupy his seat ?

The Constitution of the United States provides, "that the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Representatives, shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof;" and it also provides that "when vacancies happen in the representation from any State, the Executive authority thereof shall issue writs of election to fill such vacancies." On the 14th of February, 1812, the Legislature of Ohio prescribed that, on the second Tuesday of October, 1812, the electors in that State should elect suitable persons to represent that State in Congress, for a term of two years, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1813 ; and they further prescribed, "that at every period of two years, from the said second Tuesday of October, the electors of each Congressional district in that State shall, in like manner, vote for a suitable person to represent that State in the Congress of the United States, for the term of two years, to commence on the 4th day of March next thereafter."

Under these provisions of constitutional and statute law, on the second Tuesday of October, 1816, Mr.

Herrick was elected to represent the State of Ohio in Congress, for the term of two years, to commence on the 4th day of March, 1817. By this election the Constitution of the United States, and the law of Ohio, were completely executed. Their office was performed, and no election could be held, except to fill a vacancy, until the recurring term of two years. If, after this, Mr. Herrick should die before the meeting of Congress, the Executive must issue his writ to supply the vacancy ; and it seems difficult to comprehend how, if Mr. Herrick never was a member of Congress, his death could leave a vacancy to be filled by special election.

That persons elected members of Congress are legally members before they qualify by taking the oaths, is evident, from the practice under the Constitution, in various particulars. It is provided, by the sixth section of the Constitution, that the members of Congress shall be privileged from arrest in certain cases, during their attendance at the session, and in going to and returning from the same. This privilege attaches to the members before they take the oaths, when going to attend the first session after their election. If they were not members until the oaths were taken, this could not be the case.

The militia law of the United States exempts "the members of both Houses of Congress" from the performance of militia duty. This exemption has always been considered as attaching to the members from the commencement of their term. And, in like manner, the privilege of franking is claimed and exercised by the members elect before they take their seats. In the cases here enumerated, the practice is undoubtedly predicated upon the hypothesis, that the persons elected to Congress are members from the commencement of their term.

If, then, according to the Constitution, the person elected a member of Congress becomes a member upon the day at which his term commences, your memorialist conceives that upon that day he must be capable, under the Constitution, of occupying his seat in the proper House. A person holding upon that day an office under the United States is not thus capable. On the 4th of March, 1817, Mr. Herrick held the office, and received the emoluments of United States district attorney for the Ohio district. This is an office under the United States, and the Constitution expressly declares, that "no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House of Congress during his continuance in office." He shall not be a member. If Mr. Herrick was not a member while he held his office, he cannot now be a member. If he was a member, and at the same time held an office under the United States, it would seem that the Constitution is inoperative in his particular case.

The language of the Constitution is clear and explicit. It did not mean to prohibit a person from performing the duties of a Senator or Representative, and the duties of any other office at the same time. Its object was to render the holding of an office under the United States, and the appointment of a member of Congress, utterly incompatible. The interpretation by which Mr. Herrick can hold his seat, permits him to be a member of Congress, to enjoy the privileges and exemptions of a member of Congress, and to continue for nine months afterwards, and longer if he pleases, to hold and receive the emoluments of an office under the United States. Your memorialist most respectfully begs leave to insist that this interpretation never was contemplated by the framers of that instrument. Its purposes cannot be mistaken. It intended, by shutting out from both Houses the dependants and the creatures of the Treasury, to close the doors of the Legislature against undue Executive influence. And this was done to preserve the American Congress from the baneful consequences of that indirect and invisible system of bribery which corrupted and disgraced the British Parliament.

The provision of the Constitution occasions an absolute incapacity. A person elected to Congress, who, after the commencement of his term, continues to hold or accepts an office under the United States, is incapable of membership in the one case, and in the other vacates his own seat. Adopt a different construction, and Congress may soon be filled with men who receive Executive appointments after their election, and resign them only long enough to serve Executive purposes in the Legislature. Surely it cannot be necessary in an upright, intelligent, and enlightened legislation, that Congress should strain for an interpretation of the Constitution, by which they may retain among them as members men so fond of distinction, or so greedy of gain, as to place themselves upon a level with the menial instruments of the most corrupt Government upon earth. For here your memorialist must beg leave to suggest, that it can seldom happen that a high-minded and honorable man would wish to retain an employment under those whom, in discharging a trust of great confidence, he may soon be compelled to oppose or control.

The view which your memorialist has taken of this subject, carries conviction to his mind that Mr. Herrick, by retaining his office, rendered himself incapable of a seat in Congress; that, consequently, he has, by his own act, vacated his appointment, and has no right to a seat in your House. Your memorialist, therefore, prays that your honorable body will examine into the matters herein alleged, and that you will vacate the seat now occupied by Samuel Herrick, Esq., as a Representative in the fifteenth Congress from the fourth Congressional district in Ohio.

And your memorialist will pray, &c.

LETTER OF MR. HERRICK.

To the Hon. Mr. TAYLOR,

Chairman Committee of Elections :

SIR: The question submitted for the consideration and report of the committee is, whether a person elected a Representative to Congress on the second Tuesday of October, 1816, received the certificate of his election about the 1st day of October, 1817, and who has held the office of Attorney of the United States, before and after the 4th of March, and down to the 29th of November, 1817, and no longer, is entitled to his seat as a member of Congress in the House of Representatives on the first Monday of December following, under the Constitution of the United States, or not. This is the question, and those are the facts which make the case for the report of the committee. I am thus particular in stating the facts which make the case, in order that it may be decided upon its own peculiar merits, unconnected with the facts and circumstances which may relate to the case of any other gentleman, (if any such there are,) whose situation may be similar in some, though not in all, respects to mine. Not because I know, or even suspect, that the facts connected with this case are more favorable to my holding my seat, than the facts relating to the case of any other gentleman may be favorable to him; but because I think it just that this, like every case of individual right before this, as before every other tribunal, should stand upon its own base, and be decided according to the facts and circumstances of each particular case. The Constitution, by which the several departments of the Government has been created, is the only authority essentially connected with, or that has any bearing on the question. As well may we call to their aid the by-laws of the corporation of the City of Washington or of Alexandria, in giving a construction to that instrument, as the laws of the State of Ohio, or of any other State in the Union. I mean no disrespect to the laws of any State. They are all wise and proper, I presume, within their respective spheres; but they have no bearing on the question. Taking the Constitution for our only text and guide, does it prohibit a person, thus situated, from becoming a member of Congress? I think not. He is not precluded, either by the words or the spirit of the Constitution. That part of the Constitution, and the only part that is regarded as prohibitory, in the sixth section of the first article, reads as follows: "And no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office."

What, sir, is necessary to constitute a person a member of Congress within this provision of the Constitution? Does the mere act of the people, by electing him their Representative, either in fact or in law, make him a member of Congress? I think not, sir. For, if so, the mere nomination of the President, or the mere nomination of the President with the approbation of the Senate, may constitute a judge in law or in fact of one of your courts an Ambassador, a Consul, or any other officer, which the President and Senate have the power, under the Constitution, of appointing; and that, too, with or without the consent of the person thus nominated, without any evidence of his acceptance, and without his taking the oath of office as prescribed and required by law; a doctrine which, I presume, would not be contended for even by the memorialist himself. And yet this position, as preposterous as it manifestly is, is nevertheless correct, if the election of a Representative by the people, without any act on his part, evidencing his consent, or proving his acceptance, will constitute him a member of Congress. So far is this from being the law, as it regards this case, that I believe in every instance, as well under the Government of the United States, as under the several State governments, there is always one or more acts to be performed, both by the candidate or contemplated officer, and by the Government or people, as the case may be; all of which must be performed before any person can be constituted an officer, either in law or in fact; and such is peculiarly the case as it respects a member of Congress. First, the people must elect him. Second, the votes must be canvassed. Third, his election must be duly proclaimed. And, fourth, the evidence of his election, and certificate of the fact, must be made out and furnished him by the Executive of the State. All these acts are required to be performed by the people and the Government, and that, too, before the person elected is bound even to know that he is elected; and even then it would be unreasonable to say that the person elected should not have some little time to reflect on the subject, and to make up his mind whether he would resign one office to accept of another. But the performance of all the acts above-mentioned do not constitute him a member of Congress. He is merely a Representative elect; an inchoate or inceptive member.

There are yet two other acts to be performed, one by the Government, another by the inchoate member, or the Representative elect, before his right to his seat is consummated, and before he is, agreeably to the language and spirit of the Constitution, a member of Congress. He must appear in this place, and consent to take the oath as prescribed to support the Constitution, and the Speaker must administer that oath to him. This act of his, in consenting to take the oath, is the only legal evidence known to your Constitution or laws, of his having accepted the office; and his having taken the oath, is the only legal evidence that he is, in law and in fact, a member of Congress—the other acts enumerated having also been performed. This case may be assimilated to that of any other contract made when the people or the Government form one party, and an individual the other party; or to that of a contract made by two individuals; the assent of both to the contract must be proved, or it is no contract. If all the acts which I have enumerated are not necessary to be performed, to constitute a member of Congress, how many are necessary? Where is the dividing line drawn? And by what is it drawn? The Constitution has drawn no line between the performance of the whole or a part of those acts. And upon the same principle that the performance of any one of those essential acts and conditions to constitute a member may be dispensed with, the whole may be dispensed with, and a person is equally a member of Congress, with or without the consent of the people, or of his own consent. It is contended that a Representative elect, in the State of Ohio, and before he takes the oath required by the Constitution, was, on the 4th of March last, a member of Congress, or he was not a member; if a member, he could not hold the office of attorney; and if not a member, there was a vacancy, and the Executive should or might have issued a writ, ordering a new election to fill the vacancy. To support this position, a statute of Ohio is cited, and which, it is said, provides for the election of a Representative on the second Tuesday of October, for the term of two years, to commence on the 4th day of March thereafter. That there is such a statute is not denied. I have, however, before entered my protest against the propriety of dragging in the statute of any State, to control or vary the correct meaning and construction of the Constitution of the United States. From whence, sir, did the Legislature of Ohio derive their authority to pass a statute determining when the office of a member of Congress shall begin, or when it shall end, or how long it shall continue? Surely not from this Constitution. The only power given by the Constitution to the State Legislatures on this subject, is that of prescribing the times, places, and manner of holding elections; fourth section, first article. The second section of the first article of the Constitution provides for the election of the Representatives every second year by the people of the several States, without fixing any time when the office shall commence. As, then, neither the Constitution, nor any law made by the authority of that instrument, fixes the time when the office of a member of Congress begins, it is but fair to conclude that it was the intention of the Convention that the office should commence at the time the oath was administered to the Representative by the Speaker, and not before. Or otherwise, that convention of statesmen, good and wise as they were, would expressly have fixed on some other and earlier period, and not have left the question open for construction.

I accord with the position assumed, that a Representative elect, on the 4th of March, and before he takes the necessary oath, was a member of Congress, or he was not a member, within the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution: I maintain the negative of this position. If a Representative elect was, on the 4th of March, and before he took the oath, a member, then not only all the rights and privileges of a member instantly attach to him, but also all the rights and privileges of the people on their Representative, as instantly attached to them. I presume it will not be said that the rights of the Representative elect of the people attach to him before the rights of the people on him attach to them. No, sir. Those respective rights have a simultaneous beginning: and suppose the President had thought proper, on the 4th of March, or soon thereafter, to have called an extra session of Congress, (as he had a right to do,) and the Representative elect, before he had taken the oath, had been summoned to attend at this place, and refused obedience to the summons, could his obedience have been forced? No, sir. And suppose, on the 1st of December, the Constitutional period for the meeting of Congress, the House had met, and there not being a quorum to do business; suppose a member elect, but who had not been sworn into office, was walking the streets of this city, attending to his ordinary private concerns, with the certificate of his election in his pocket, as made out by the Executive of the State, could the House compel the attendance of such Representative elect? Or suppose the Sergeant-at-Arms should seize the Representative elect, and drag him before the House, vi et armis, and Mr. Speaker should rise with his bible in his hand, and order him to be sworn, and to repeat the form of the oath after him, and the Representative should refuse, by saying he would not repeat the oath, he would not be sworn, and that he would not perform the duties of a member: I ask, would not Mr. Speaker, and would not the House, to use a homely phrase, be at the end of their tether? And why? Because a Representative elect cannot perform any duty enjoined upon him by law, before he has taken the oath of office, and he cannot take the oath before Congress convenes, and which is the only legal, unequivocal, and certain evidence that he has accepted the office, and has become a member. Nor do the rights and privileges of a member of Congress instantly attach to a Representative elect on the 4th of March, and before he takes the oath of office. If he, indeed, takes the oath on the 4th of March, I agree that his rights and privileges attach to him, in the manner as prescribed by the Constitution, so soon as he takes the oath, and not before.

It will be perceived, sir, that there is an evident distinction running throughout the Constitution, between the meaning of the word representative and the word member. The word representative, as used in the Constitution, signifies a person who has been elected, but not qualified to act; to him the rights and privileges of a member do not attach. The word member signifies a person who has not only been elected, but has taken the oath of office. It means a member; de jure and de facto to him the rights and privileges do attach. Thus, for example, in the fourth section of the first article, "the times, places, and manner of holding elections for Senators and Reprerepresentatives shall be prescribed in each State by the Legislature thereof;" not for Senators and members. And again, by the fifth section of the first article, "each House shall be the judge of the elections, returns, and qualifications of its own members," not of its own representatives, "and a majority of each shall constitute a quorum; but a smaller number may adjourn from day to day, and may be authorized to compel the attendance of absent members," not the attendance of absent representatives. "Each House may determine the rules of its proceedings, punish its members," not its representatives, "for disorderly behavior, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member," not expel a representative. And the sixth section of the first article, called the prohibitory section, does not say that a person holding any office under the United States shall not be a representative during his continuance in office. It says, no person holding, &c., shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office. And however it may have been the fact in some instances, that Representatives elect, before they were qualified and took their seats in the House, may have claimed exemptions from the performance of military duties, (as is alleged by the memorialist,) and the benefit of the privilege of franking letters, &c., (though I do not know that it is a fact that any gentleman has done it—I can answer for one that I have not done it,) yet I very much doubt whether the practice is warranted by the true construction and spirit of the Constitution. Again, sir, if the Convention who framed the Constitution intended that no person holding office under the United States should be a Representative elect during his continuance in such office, they would have employed the necessary and appropriate language for the expression of that intention, as they certainly were capable of doing, and not employed the language here used.

If such had been their intention, the Convention would have employed the same language which they have used in the second section of the first article, where they have clearly expressed such intention, when they say, "No person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, been seven years a citizen of the United States, and an inhabitant of that State in which he shall be elected." So in the first section of the second article, "No Senator or Representative, or person holding any office of trust or profit under the United States, shall be an Elector." Here the Convention has not only said that a person holding an office under the United States shall not act as an elector, but that he shall not be a candidate; he shall not be appointed an elector.

I have only to add, sir, that if a contrary doctrine prevails, it will have the effect, in many instances, of defeating the views and thwarting the wishes of the people. It will have the effect, in some instances, of limiting the number of persons out of whom the people will be permitted to select their candidate for a member of Congress. I can assure you, sir, that I should not have permitted my name to be used as a candidate, if I had not most conscientiously believed that I had the right, lawfully and equitably, to hold the office of attorney (as inconsiderable as the emoluments of that office are) until I took the oath as a member of this House. For, by taking a seat in this House, I have not only resigned the office of Attorney of the United States on the 29th November, (which I did cheerfully at the time,) but shall also suffer a considerable loss by neglecting the practice of my profession as a lawyer, which has heretofore been profitable. The latter loss I believed would be as great as my pecuniary circumstances could comfortably sustain for the honor of holding a seat in this House, without resigning the office of attorney, long before I became in fact a member of Congress.

I have the honor to be, &c.,

SAMUEL HERRICK.

WASHINGTON, Dec. 29, 1817.

Answer of Mr. Holmes, filed in behalf of Mr. Herrick.

Mr. Herrick is duly elected a Representative in the Congress of the United States from the State of Ohio. At the time of his election, and until after the 4th of March last, he held the office of the U. S. Attorney for the District of Ohio; which office he resigned before the commencement of this session of Congress.

Upon these facts his right to a seat is contested. In the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution of the United States, it is provided that "no Senator or Representative shall, during the term for which he was elected, be appointed to any civil office under the authority of the United States, which shall have been created, or the emoluments whereof shall have been increased, during such time; and no person holding any office under the United States shall be a member of either House during his continuance in office." The first clause affects the office, the last the membership. The first prohibits the Executive from taking away a Representative from the people, and very properly extends it to the whole period "for which he is elected." And it guards against the temptation to create offices for our own emolument.

Had the prohibition, in the other clause relating to membership, been intended to extend to the same period of time, it would have been so expressed; the sentence would have then stood, "and no person holding any office under the United States during the time for which he was elected, shall be a member of either House." The changing the phraseology in the same paragraph, would not have been without design; the prohibition does not extend to the time for which he is elected, nor even in which he is a member, but is expressly limited to his continuance in office.

When the Constitution disqualifies a person from serving the people as their Representative, the reason of the disqualification is apparent. By the second paragraph of the second section of the same article, no person shall be a Representative who shall not, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State. The inhabiting is required at the time of his election, that the people may know his ability and his principles, and he may understand their interests and inclinations.

The first and principal inquiry then is, was Mr. Herrick, in the sense intended in this clause of the Constitution, a member of this House "during his continuance in office?"

It would be difficult to perceive how a person can be a member of either House until he has met with the others, taken the oath, and submitted to the usual organization. Before this he has no powers as a member. He can do no act in that capacity. He is, to be sure, a Representative or member elect, but he is not a member of the House until that House shall have judged of his "election, return, and qualification."

A person cannot be a member until he accepts the appointment. This is not done until he appears and expresses his willingness to act, or, at least, claims some privilege of his election. Many members do not receive their credentials until they arrive at the Seat of Government. A notice that they are chosen does not make them members, nor is it evidence of their acceptance. When they elect to act, they signify their acceptance; when they are qualified, they become members.

The word "member" is used, throughout the Constitution, to signify a constituent branch of an organized House. Thus the House of Representatives is to be composed of members, &c. The Senate may convict, on impeachment, with the concurrence of two-thirds of the members present. Each House shall be the judge of the election, &c., of its own members, may punish its members for disorderly behaviour, and, with the concurrence of two-thirds, expel a member. At the desire of one-fifth, the yeas and nays of the members are to be entered on the journals, and there is no instance in which they are spoken of as members, except as constituting a House, unless the power to compel the attendance of absent members is an exception. If this power extends to compelling the attendance of those who have never taken their seats, it would seem that in one instance the Constitution describes persons as members before they are qualified. But it is at least doubtful, whether a minority of the House can exercise forcible means to bring in a man who has never taken the oath, nor submitted to the rules. It is not readily perceived what officer could be employed to execute a compulsus upon a member elect, in a remote part of the country, who had never submitted to the authority of the House, nor signified his acceptance of his place.

If the expression is intended to extend to those only who absent themselves after they are qualified, it is not an exception. But, at most, it is not an exception. It speaks of the House compelling the attendance of absent members, or members elect. The word absent qualifies the meaning. Besides, it only proves that the Representatives are called members after the commencement of the session, which might be safely admitted.

When they are spoken of in the Constitution in relation to other times than while in session, they are invariably called Senators and Representatives, and not members. Thus no person shall be a Representative who shall not have attained to the age of twenty-five years, and, when elected, be an inhabitant of the State; so of a Senator. The times, &c., of holding the elections of Senators and Representatives shall be prescribed by the Legislatures of the States. Senators and Representatives shall receive a compensation, and be privileged from arrest. These privileges embrace the time in which they are members, and more; including their going and returning. No Senator or Representative shall, during the time for which he is elected, be appointed to any civil office, &c.; and then comes the clause under consideration, that no person holding an office shall be a member.

This being the solitary instance, among so many, in which the word is extended beyond the session, there should be some good reason for this difference of its meaning. Now, what is the reason? Does the office influence the election? The objection comes too late. It seems to be agreed that a person may hold his office at least to the time of his election.

Does it influence the conduct of the member? The office ceases before he begins to act. There are very good reasons why a person shall not be a member during his continuance in office. His duties as a Representative are not to be interrupted by the duties of his office, nor his motives perverted by Executive influence. If, before he is called to act as a Representative, he is disencumbered of the office, the former reason ceases; and why does not the latter? Can it be pretended that, because he has had an office, the influence continues after the office ceases? Is a Representative purified if he resigns an office on the third, and polluted if he holds it to the fourth of March? A doctrine like this leads to the most palpable absurdities. The election in New York is twenty months before the usual session in which the Representatives are to serve; that in Tennessee, about four months. Suppose a gentleman in each State to be appointed to an office of the same kind, on the same day. They both hold their offices up to the day in which the election takes place in Tennessee, resign on the same day, are chosen to Congress, and take their seats. Yet, because the gentleman from New York held his office, after the 4th of March, and after his election, and the gentleman from Tennessee held his to the same time and up to his election, the latter is qualified, and the former disqualified. Here are two gentlemen, who hold their offices and take their seats contemporaneously, and one is admitted and the other rejected, and the reason is, that the one would be under Executive influence, and the other would not. It is a poor compliment, indeed, to those venerable sages who framed the Constitution, to suppose them capable of such palpable absurdities.

At the time the Federal Constitution was framed, an opinion had long prevailed that Executive and judicial officers ought not to partake in legislation. It was deemed expedient that the three departments of Government should be kept distinct, lest members of a Legislature, holding offices under the Executive, might be too much inclined to yield to his will, and extend his power. But it would have betrayed unreasonable jealousy to apprehend that gratitude for past, or hopes of future favors would lure a member from his duty. Had the framers of the Constitution apprehended any danger from this source, they would have defined and equalized the time that an office must be executed, before the incumbent could act as a legislator. And they would have especially extended their prohibition to a period after the legislator's power had expired. Men are less inclined to be influenced by gratitude for past, than hopes for future benefits. Selfishness induces the belief that when the office is executed, the account is balanced. But the hopes of future smiles afford a much stronger inducement to a member to forget his constituents, and cling to the Executive.

But it is insisted that Congress is a perpetual body, and as soon as one House expires another springs into existence. Visionary as is this theory, it becomes us to notice it. The Constitution has provided that the House shall be composed of members chosen every second year, but has not defined at what time their period shall commence. It is the law that has established the 4th of March as the commencement of the two years within which a Congress shall meet and act. The time of election, however, is still left with the States. In Virginia, North Carolina, and Tennessee, the Representatives are chosen after the 4th of March. If membership commences at this time, the Representatives of those States must be excepted, or be members before they are chosen. And should the other States postpone their elections until after the 4th of March, which they have a right to do, this doctrine of a perpetual Congress would be subverted, and still the Constitution and the liberties of the people would be safe.

But it is said that because, by the Constitution and laws, Representatives are entitled to privileges before and after their sessions, this implies that they must be members while these privileges exist. This argument proves too much—Congress might be summoned to meet on the 4th of March. They must set out for the Seat of Government, and would be exempt from arrest before the former Congress expires. But they cannot be members while another Congress exists. They may, and generally do, hold their last session until the 4th of March, when their term expires. They are, however, exempt from arrests during their return, but they are not members during that time. The truth is, that while going to become members, and returning after they have ceased to be members, they are entitled to this privilege. The same reason will apply when speaking of their right of franking letters, or any privileges granted by law.

But it is apprehended that a Representative would resign his office and take his seat, upon a bargain with the Executive that he should be reappointed. If this objection deserves a serious answer, it may be observed that this clause in the Constitution, in its utmost extent, is no cure for the evil. Before the election, or after and before the 4th of March, the resignation would always be made under a promise of reappointment. Were we disposed to indulge in suspicion, we should have much more reason to fear a contract for a new appointment than a reappointment. But the Constitution has provided against neither. To suppose it possible, would be a slander upon any Executive, and betray a jealousy totally unworthy a free and enlightened people.

The State constitutions afford a very good commentary upon the clause under consideration. The incompatibility is generally confined to the power of acting. In few instances it extends to eligibility, but in none to the precise time for which the person is elected.

By the constitution of Massachusetts, formed in 1780, executive and legislative powers cannot be exercised by the same person.

By that of Virginia, formed in 1776, the exercise of the powers of the different departments of the Government at the same time is prohibited.

By that of Delaware, of the same year, certain officers are made ineligible to either House, and members accepting of offices vacate their seats.

By that of New Jersey, of the same year, no person holding an office of profit, &c., shall be entitled to a seat in the General Assembly; but, on his being elected, and taking his seat, his office shall be vacated. There are instances which happened during the Revolution, at a time when the corruptions of Parliament were deprecated and magnified.

Several of the State constitutions, adopted since that of the United States, have copied the words of that instrument in this particular.

By that of Georgia, however, the person holding an office shall not be allowed to take his seat.

By that of Tennessee, no person of the above description shall have a seat.

By that of Mississippi, laid on the table during this session, the prohibition commences with the first session after the election. With such expressions of the opinions and inclinations of the people before them, the framers of this Constitution made the provision in question; and it seems impossible to doubt their intention to prohibit merely the exercise of the powers of the different departments of the Government by the same person at the same time.

Were this construction a novel one, and resisted by the uniform practice of this House, the propriety of urging this doctrine might be reasonably doubted. Had the indulgence of the practice proved dangerous to the independence of the House, or the liberties of the people, it would be our duty to correct it. But ever since the first organization of the Government, repeated instances of the kind have occurred, and those even stronger than that of the member objected to. Mr. Tracy, of Connecticut, while a Senator of Congress, was appointed by the President to the performance of some office relating to the Indians, the duties of which encroached upon the session of Congress, but he finished the duties, took, and retained his seat.

Mr. Dawson, a member from Virginia, between the first and second session of the Congress for which he was elected, was appointed as a messenger to France. He performed the duties of his appointment, returned, and resumed and retained his seat.

Mr. Turner, of Massachusetts, claimed the seat occupied by Mr. Baylies. The House decided in his favor. He resigned the office of postmaster, and immediately took his seat.

Mr. Worthington and Mr. Morrow, Senators in Congress from Ohio, were, in 1812, appointed by the President to make a treaty with certain Indians in that State. They attended to the duties assigned, after the 4th of March, and returned, took, and retained their seats.

In nearly every Congress since the commencement of the Government, postmasters have been returned as members, and such members have almost uniformly held their offices after the 4th of March succeeding their election. Since the year 1800, are, among others, the following cases: Benjamin Tallmadge, Erastus Root, Matthew Lyon, Thomas Gholson, Samuel McKee, S. Dana, E. Wickes, and H. Tracy. When a Representative is fairly elected by the people, every doubt should weigh in his favor. Unless the construction of the Constitution is plainly against him, he should retain his seat. But when the letter and the spirit of the Constitution, and its rational and practical construction, are favorable, there seems no plausible reason why a member should be disturbed.

CASE OF ELIAS EARLE.

Mr. TAYLOR, of New York, from the Committee of Elections, made a special report on the case of ELIAS EARLE, who held the office of a deputy postmaster subsequent to the fourth day of March last, declaring him entitled to a seat in this House; which was read, and referred to the Committee of the Whole on the case of Samuel Herrick. The report is as follows:

"The Committee of Elections, to which was referred a resolution of the House of the 10th of December, 1817, and a message of the President of the United States, of the 29th of the same month, report, in part:

"That, in the month of April, 1815, Elias Earle was appointed postmaster at Centreville, in the State of South Carolina; that, at the last Congressional election in that State, he was elected one of its Representatives to this House. On the 10th of February,

Judicial Records.

JANUARY, 1818.

1817, the Governor executed a certificate of his election, which Mr. Earle states to have been received by him in April or May following. On the 10th of September, 1816, he addressed to the Postmaster General, and sent, by mail, a letter, requesting it to be accepted 'as his resignation as postmaster,' and recommending the appointment of a Mr. Tillinghast, who was accordingly appointed; but having omitted to execute the bond required by law, he was never commissioned. The office continued to be executed in the name of Mr. Earle, and he superintended the same until the 12th of June, 1817, when his connexion with it ceased, as appears by the message above mentioned.

"We subjoin hereto a letter from the Postmaster General, marked (A), and copies of two letters of Mr. Earle, marked (B) and (C), which are designed to be considered as part of this report, and respectfully submit the following resolution:

"Resolved, That Elias Earle is entitled to a seat in this House."

GENERAL POST OFFICE, Dec. 30, 1817.

Elias Earle, Esq., being postmaster at Centreville, South Carolina, September 10, 1816, sent a resignation, and recommended Daniel H. Tillinghast to be his successor. An appointment was sent to Mr. Tillinghast, who never executed the bond. On the 12th of June, 1817, by letter, Mr. Earle recommended John Morriss, jr., to be appointed postmaster. The appointment was sent to Mr. Morriss, who also declined. During the above period, Mr. Earle superintended the direction of the office, though he considers his resignation to relate back to 1816.

CENTREVILLE, Sept. 10, 1816.

SIR: You will be so good as to receive and accept of this as my resignation as postmaster at this place, and I also take the liberty of recommending Daniel H. Tillinghast as postmaster, in my place. In answer to your inquiries where I was born, I can only say, in Virginia. Your obedient servant,

ELIAS EARLE.

To the POSTMASTER GENERAL.

(C.)

CENTREVILLE, June 12, 1817.

SIR: Enclosed is a receipt paid Alexander Waddle for the amount of forty dollars, returned by your order, which amounts to upwards of twenty more than is due you, by the returns forwarded to you last mail from this office, which I paid at your request, and which can be settled for. This office is for several months without a postmaster, although I wrote to you last September, and lately again. I hope you will name Mr. John Morriss, jr., as it is impossible I can keep any charge of it, as I am almost constantly from home. It has hitherto been tolerably well attended to.

Your obedient servant,

ELIAS EARLE.

To the POSTMASTER GENERAL.

JUDICIAL RECORDS, &amp;c.

The House then resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prescribe the effect of certain records and judicial proceedings.

The question being on an amendment proposed by Mr. BALDWIN to the bill, as a substitute for the first section—

Mr. ROSS opposed both the bill and amendments at some length, on Constitutional grounds, as well as on the ground of expediency. If the principle of the bill was correct, he said, declaring as it did, that judgments rendered in one State should be of equal effect in any other State, the provisions of the bill ought to have gone further, and declared every act of the Legislature of any State to be of equal force in any other State; for the two declarations would have been in principle the same. The Constitution had given to Congress the power to declare what should make a record authentic, but not to prescribe its effect in any other State; and any other construction than this, Mr. R. considered as tending to the establishment of a consolidated Government. In regard to the expediency of the bill, Mr. R. said he viewed every attempt to change the common law as injurious; and he was therefore opposed to this bill. Leave the question to the decision of common law, and fewer evils would result from it, he said, than from any legislative provision. In the course of a speech of half an hour, Mr. R. enforced these general views by a variety of illustrations and references to the practices prevailing in the different States, &c. With respect to the argument of its extending commercial credit, on which Mr. SPENCER the other day justified the bill, Mr. R. did not allow it the force claimed for it; for, he said, he would not agree to pass the bill to enable the New York merchant, when his customer had come there from Kentucky, to spring the trap upon him, compel him to confess judgment, or go to prison for want of bail, and that judgment to have the same effect given to it in Kentucky as it would have had in New York.

Mr. POINDEXTER spoke to the amendment; which he considered radically defective in giving the same force to judgments in other States as they would have had in the State in which they were given. He took a legal view of the question, as connected with the practice in the courts of the several States, the variance of which he showed would make the provisions of the amendment unequal in their operation.

Mr. STRONG, in the course of a few observations he made on the question, said he did not know whether any amendment to the bill would make it palatable to him; but he certainly thought the amendment much preferable to the bill, inasmuch as the amendment gave to judgments in one State a conclusive effect in another, only in cases where it appeared on the record there had been a trial.

Mr. BALDWIN spoke in support of his amendment; which, he said, went to vary the bill in all its essential features, as he showed in the course of his remarks. He drew a comparison between the bill and his amendment, showing why he preferred the latter.

Mr. SPENCER replied to those who had supported the amendment, and vindicated the original bill by a series of arguments drawn from the prevailing practice and the principles of law. He avoided replying to the Constitutional objection Mr. ROSS had advanced, as not being on this incidental question fairly before the House. He insisted, however, on the effect the bill would have in sustaining commercial confidence, and in strengthening the ties which bind the States together by making their co-operation more harmonious. In conclusion, he submitted to gentlemen (repeating Mr. WILLIAMS's remark) whether they would not give to the records of the courts of the respective States the same effect which was now allowed to the records of any petty court in the West Indies.

The question was then taken on Mr. BALDWIN's motion to amend the bill, and negatived.

Other amendments were proposed to the bill, some of which were agreed to, and others rejected; in the proposition and discussion of which Messrs. STORRS, ORR, TERRY, BEECHER, ROSS, PINDALL, STRONG, FORSYTH, SPENCER, and LIVERMORE, bore part. In the course of the debate,

Mr. HOPKINSON gave at large, but with precision, his views of the Constitutional objection suggested by Mr. ROSS. He was of opinion that Congress were entirely at liberty to act on the subject, and that it was expedient to do so, on account of the variety of constructions now given to the law on the subject. He saw no objection to the bill, on the ground some had taken, that it would put the parties in a worse situation than they were in before; on the contrary, the bill would clear up much ambiguity, and, so far as it had effect, would be more favorable to the party sued than the present practice. Mr. H. made a perspicuous argument to sustain his legal view of the question.

When the Committee rose for the day, a motion by Mr. FORSYTH was under consideration to strike out the second section of the bill.

The Committee obtained leave to sit again.

TUESDAY, January 6.

Mr. MASON, of Massachusetts, presented a petition of sundry manufacturers of paper, praying that a duty of two dollars per ream may be imposed on all paper imported into the United States.—Referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

Mr. HARRISON presented a petition of Martha Perry, widow, daughter of the late Captain Joshua Huddy, of New Jersey, who, in the Revolutionary war, was cruelly and wantonly put to death, by a band of Tories; praying for a pension.—Referred to the Committee on Pensions and Revolutionary Claims.

Mr. HERBERT presented a petition of the Columbian Institute, for the promotion of arts and sciences, established at the City of Washington, praying for an act of incorporation.—Referred to the Committee for the District of Columbia.

Mr. STROTHER presented a petition of Armistead T. Mason, contesting the election and return of Charles F. Mercer, as one of the members of this House, for the State of Virginia, and praying to be admitted to a seat in the House, in the place of the said Charles F. Mercer.—Referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, presented a petition of sundry emigrants to the United States from Switzerland, praying that twelve townships of land, lying in some one of the Territories of the United States, may be granted to them upon the same terms and conditions as were granted, at the last session of Congress, to sundry emigrants from France.—Referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The SPEAKER laid before the House sundry depositions and documents, on the subject of the contested election of Charles F. Mercer, a member of this House from the State of Virginia; which were referred to the Committee of Elections.

Mr. MCCOY, from the Committee of Claims, to whom was referred the petition of John Bate, with the report of the Secretary of the Treasury thereon, and the bill for his relief, reported the said bill with an amendment; which was read and agreed to by the House, and the bill was committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HERRICK, from the Committee on Private Land Claims, reported a bill confirming the claim of William Daniel, or his legal representatives, to a tract of land in the State of Mississippi; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

Mr. HERRICK also reported a bill, confirming the claim of Tobias Rheams to a tract of land granted to him by the Spanish Government; which was read twice, and committed to the Committee of the Whole last appointed.

Mr. PARRIS, from the committee appointed on so much of the President's Message as relates to the Public Buildings and to the erection of additional public edifices, reported a bill making further provision for repairing the public buildings; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The bill from the Senate, entitled "An act for the relief of William Edwards and John G. Stubbs," was read the second time, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

NATIONAL FLAG.

Mr. WENDOVER, from the committee appointed to inquire into the expediency of altering the flag of the United States, made a report, which was read; when Mr. W. reported a bill to alter the flag of the United States; which was read twice, and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

The report is as follows:

That they have maturely considered the subject referred to them, and have adopted, substantially, the report of the committee to whom was referred the same subject at the last session of Congress, as forming a part of this report. The committee are fully persuaded that the form selected for the American flag was truly emblematical of our origin and existence as an independent nation, and that as such, it having met the approbation and received the support of the citizens of the Union, it ought to undergo no change that would decrease its conspicuity, or tend to deprive it of its representative character. The committee, however, believe that an increase in the number of States in the Union since the flag was altered by law sufficiently indicates the propriety of such a change in the arrangement of the flag as shall best accord with the reasons that led to its original adoption, and sufficiently point to important periods of our national history.

The original flag of the United States was composed of thirteen stripes and thirteen stars, and was adopted by a resolution of the Continental Congress on the 14th of June, 1777. On the 13th of January, 1794, after two new States had been admitted into the Union, the National Legislature passed an act that the stripes and stars should, on a day fixed, be increased to fifteen each, to comport with the then number of independent States. The accession of new States since that alteration, and the certain prospect that at no distant period the number of States will be considerably multiplied, render it, in the opinion of the committee, highly expedient to increase the number of stripes, as every flag must, in some measure, be limited in its size, from the circumstance of convenience to the place on which it is to be displayed; while an increase would necessarily decrease their magnitude, and render them proportionably less distinct to distant observation; this consideration has induced many to retain only the general form of the flag, while there actually exists a great want of uniformity in its adjustment, particularly when used on small private vessels.

The national flag being in general use by vessels of almost every description, it appears to the committee of considerable importance to adopt some arrangement calculated to prevent in future great or expensive alterations. Under these impressions, they are led to believe no alteration could be made more emblematical of our origin and present existence, as composed of a number of independent and united States, than to reduce the stripes in the flag to the original number of thirteen, to represent the number of States then contending for and happily achieving their independence, and to increase the stars to correspond with the number of States now in the Union, and hereafter to add one star to the flag whenever a new State shall be fully admitted.

These slight alterations will, in the opinion of the committee, meet the general approbation, as well of those who may have regretted a former departure from the original flag, as of such as are solicitous to see in it a representation of every State in the Union.

The committee cannot believe that in retaining only thirteen stripes it necessarily follows they should be distinctly considered in reference to certain individual States, inasmuch as nearly all the new States were a component part of, and represented in, the original States; and inasmuch, also, as the flag is intended to signify numbers, and not local and particular sections of the Union; nor can the committee view the proposed inconsiderable addition to be made on the admission of a new State in the light of a departure from that permanency of form which ought to characterize the flag of the nation. The committee respectfully report a bill.

COMPENSATION TO MEMBERS, &c.

On motion of Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, the several orders of the day preceding the bill to fix the compensation of the members of the Senate and House of Representatives, were postponed, and the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on the said bill.

[The bill provides that the daily compensation of the members, during their attendance on Congress, shall be nine dollars, and the allowance for travelling to and from the seat of Congress, at the rate of nine dollars for every twenty miles of the distance.]

Mr. ROSS, of Pennsylvania, by way of trying the sense of the Committee on the subject, moved to strike out the word nine and insert the word six, as the amount of daily compensation.

The question on this motion was loudly called for, indicating a disposition to take the sense of the House without debate.

Mr. DESHA said, he should support the motion made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania, however unfashionable it might be, which was to strike out the word nine and insert six, and, he suspected, should be found in a small minority; but that should not prevent him from discharging his duty. It is a little mortifying, said he, to see such extreme anxiety manifested on the occasion. Does it look dignified in this body, because they are immediately interested in this measure, to see them urge it forward to the exclusion of all other business, that is entitled to precedence under the rules of the House? I sincerely wish that we may not have the same scene acted over again, that was acted the first session of last Congress, when the compensation bill, of famous memory, was on the carpet. This bill contemplates giving the members nine dollars per day, and nine dollars for every twenty miles in travelling to and returning from the Seat of Government. Do the gentlemen seriously believe that the people will submit to this without a murmur? If they do, I suspect they will be most egregiously mistaken. It may be deemed vanity in me to suppose, that any reasons I could advance, in opposition to this measure, would have a tendency to change the minds of gentlemen; and, indeed, the subject has been so long maturing before the committee, which was ordered to prepare and report the bill, that, it is presumed, gentlemen have principally made up their minds; but, notwithstanding which, it is a duty I owe those whom I have the honor to represent, as well in compliance with my own feelings, to express my sentiments against the bill, and whatever duty leads to I trust I shall never shrink from. Disorder, however it may be calculated to embarrass, shall not drive me from the floor. I regret extremely that the committee, to whom the resolution was referred, to prepare and report a bill on the subject of the daily allowance of the members, had not left a blank in the bill, and left the Committee of the Whole the privilege of filling the blank with whatever sum they might think proper. Why this deviation from the usual course? I appeal to gentlemen to say, if this does not look like forestalling opinion. When I understood who were the gentlemen that composed the committee, I anticipated the recommendation of high pay, because they are professional gentlemen, and, I presume, accustomed to receiving high fees. My anticipations are realized. They have recommended nine dollars per day, and nine dollars for every twenty miles in travelling to and returning from the Seat of Government. It is in the nature of things for those who make their money lightly to permit it to go freely, and are generally advocates for extravagant salaries, or high pay; but gentlemen ought to recollect that we are not legislating for any particular class of men, but for the whole community; that we are legislating for the people. Sir, who filled the public purse, and who fought your battles in the late war, by which you were prevented from being engulfed in the vortex of tyranny? The people. But, sir, I am afraid the services of the people are soon forgotten by the fashionable legislators of the day, who assume the right to rule the councils and dictate to the nation. Compare even our former pay with the pay of those who fought our battles, and see if it loses anything by the comparison.

Nine dollars per day! We commence our session at twelve o'clock, and have generally terminated them this session at about three, amounting to about three dollars per hour. Would not the honest and industrious farmer or mechanic, who rises early and works late, and, by his greatest exertions from one end of the year to the other, considers he is doing a good business, if, not getting rich, he can save at the end of the year, clear of all expenses, between fifty and a hundred dollars; I say, would not such men think three dollars per hour high pay, and ought not the opinions of such men to be respected? They certainly ought. I view such men as the life and sinew of liberty, whose feelings are worthy of being consulted, and whose opinions ought to be respected.

Mr. Chairman, it is not in my nature to anticipate evil, but I am fearful, from the disposition I see manifested, that we are about to have an extremely extravagant and expensive Government; and who are to bear the burden of expense? The people. And, in case you should again be involved in war, who fight your battles but the people? Then ought not their opinions to be respected? It is true, the internal taxes have been removed, and the expenses of Government are to be defrayed by the revenue arising from duties on importations; but who ultimately pays these duties? The people. I grant that it is a voluntary tax— whoever purchases foreign articles pays the duty; but still it is a tax, and the people bear the burden of it. Then, I repeat it, ought not their feelings to be consulted, and their opinions respected?

Sir, can gentlemen be so blind and insensible as not to see and understand what are the feelings and opinions of the people on the subject of the pay of the members of Congress? Is it possible that gentlemen can have forgotten the extraordinary agitation of the public mind, and the conflicts that occurred previous to and about the last election of members of Congress, owing to the circumstance of the members of last Congress having raised their pay; which agitation produced such a change in the minds of the members, that the law, which passed by a considerable majority, for raising their pay, was repealed at the last session by a considerable majority?

Mr. Chairman, I view it as a duty we owe to the people of the United States to fix the allowance of the members of Congress on its former footing, at six dollars per day. I regret extremely that it was not done last session. It ought to have been done, as it was not only proper in itself, but because the people expected it, and, if it had, we would not only have avoided much difficulty, but have satisfied the public mind, which with me, however unfashionable it may be, is an object of the greatest consequence. The feelings of the people on this subject were well understood—they had expressed them in plain language, and in an audible voice, as a proof of which you may, by casting your eyes around, see how few of the members, who were honored with seats in last Congress, were permitted to take seats as members of the present Congress. Is not this proof conclusive, that the people are opposed to the pay of the members being raised so enormously high?

Sir, however gentlemen may disregard public opinion, I have (although I flatter myself that I possess, at least, a common share of independence) not been taught to do so; I view it as a principle, not only ingrafted in the nature of our Government, but as its strength, an essential to its welfare and perpetuation. When I accepted the office of Representative of the people, I considered myself under a moral obligation to represent them, as far as I could understand their views and feelings, to the utmost of my capacity, and not particularly to represent myself. When the views of the people I have the honor to represent have not been expressed, or cannot be ascertained, then I am not only at liberty, but bound to exercise my judgment for their benefit and advantage. Sir, who elected and delegated the power of a Representative to me but the people, and would not I be guilty of a dereliction of duty by betraying the trust reposed in me, as also subject myself to the charge of a breach of the moral obligation if I failed, when I knew their sentiments, to represent them accordingly?

Mr. Chairman, I said that I viewed it as the strength of this Government to pay respect and have a strict regard to public opinion. We have frequently heard it insinuated, and sometimes expressed on this floor, that money or wealth is the strength of a Government. Gentlemen must certainly forget under what kind of Government they live when they make such declarations; they must be thinking of monarchical or despotical Governments; I admit that money or wealth is the strength of such Governments; but, will what constitutes the strength of monarchical or despotical Governments be the main pillar or strength of a republican Government; a Government of the people? No, sir, it is the confidence of the people that constitutes the strength of a republican Government. Sir, while ever the Representatives of the people or public agents continue to act so as to retain their confidence, they have nothing to fear at home, nor from abroad; taxes will be paid to any amount without a murmur, and personal services cheerfully rendered; this is what constitutes the main pillar or strength of your Government. Then, sir, when such beneficial effects are to arise from it, are not gentlemen, situated as we are, having the honor to represent thirty-five thousand free people, under a moral obligation to pay attention to, and act up with the will of the people, when ascertained by positive expression or strong implication? Sir, I admit, in some of the large towns, where people are in the habit of spending money freely, where the streets are measured by the strides of aristocratic grandeur, where economy would be laughed out of countenance, and where extravagance may be said to be the order of the day, that there are numbers in favor of extravagant salaries or high pay. I admit, in some of the smaller towns in the interior, among some of the storekeepers and clerks, and another class of gentlemen, who have been accustomed to making their money light, and with whom it has been said, that prodigality in public expenditure is characteristic, that the cry is for high pay; the latter class, perhaps, because they consider a seat in Congress a more honorable, eligible, and pleasant situation than that of being engaged in the drudging business of individuals, and would be willing, if the pay were raised high enough to come up to their ideas of money-making, to quit their drudging business for seats in Congress. But, sir, are we to form a judgment on this subject in favor of raising the pay of members of Congress enormously high, because some aristocratical characters in large towns, or those in other situations who are looking forward for offices of prominence, cry aloud for it? No, sir, we must look to the yeomanry of the country, and the handicraftsman, the ostensible supporters of Government, (who, if they are not so clamorous, are more substantial,) for public opinion. Will any gentleman say, that the farmer and mechanic are crying out in favor of raising the pay of the members of Congress? Those men who fill the public purse, and fight their country's battles in time of difficulty? Here is where you must look for the true criterion by which to judge of public opinion. I say, will any gentlemen undertake to set forth on this floor, that they are in favor of extravagant pay? I believe they will not. Although the word economy is unfashionable, I consider economy one of the principal pillars on which our republican fabric stands; permit it to be removed, and the fabric immediately totters, and ultimately falls to the ground. High pay will necessarily produce extravagance. The contagion will ramify and spread until the whole body politic is disordered, and ultimately becomes weak and imbecile, when demagogues will rise, take advantage of its imbecility, overturn the republican fabric, and on its ruins build up tyranny, which cannot, taking into view our present feelings on political matters, be a desirable order of things. Then, would not wisdom dictate the policy of being cautious in not adopting any measure, however plausible it might be, and however gratifying to our feelings momentarily, that might have the most distant tendency to produce such a state of things?

Mr. Chairman, it has been said that members of Congress were worse paid than any other officers of Government. I deny the fact; it is true that the President of the United States and the foreign Ministers are better paid than members of Congress, and, perhaps, some of the subordinate officers of Congress, according to grade; but, as to the latter, honor or patriotism has no agency in their acceptance of offices; emolument is the consideration which influences them; but I hope that is not the case with members; at least I know it ought not to be. It is true members ought to receive what would enable them to live genteelly, and be enabled to save some money; which they can do if they do not go into unnecessary extravagance, or pay any attention to economy, on the former pay, six dollars per day, and six dollars for every twenty miles in travelling to and returning from the Seat of Government. No, sir, the most of our civil officers, and nearly all the military, are worse paid than members of Congress; and what plea have we to justify us in raising our pay but the depreciation of money? Sir, could we, and look justice in the face, refuse to raise the pay of all the officers of the Government, both civil and military, in proportion to what we raise our own; because the same plea of the depreciation of money would operate in their case that does in ours; are we prepared for such a state of things? I believe we are not; neither do I believe the people would bear us out in them. It is lamentably true that money has depreciated; and what is the cause of this depreciation? Certainly the great excess of bank paper that has been thrown into circulation, for which, if Congress have not been entirely blameable, they have contributed their proportion towards it by setting the example of chartering a number of banks; and one, particularly, in its character such a prodigious machine, that I fear it will ultimately operate as a curse on the land, by changing the politics of the Government, and finally giving law to the nation.

Mr. Chairman, it is frequently said, that if we want talents on this floor we must bid up high for them; that men in lucrative employments or professions will not come here unless you raise the pay pretty high; which is an acknowledgment that patriotism, or the honor of serving freemen, could have no agency in bringing such men here, and that their sole object in coming here would be money. I hope I never shall see this Hall filled with characters who would make money the first consideration in coming here. Whenever money is made the first consideration in coming here you will see all the evil passions, incident to the nature of man, set to work, in order to enable them to secure seats in Congress, when liberty, the best blessing of man, will be on the totter, and will soon pass away. Gentlemen talk of talents. Sir, I draw a wide distinction between what is commonly called talents, and real mind, solid judgment, accompanied by a considerable portion of common sense. We have seen visionary characters here who were, by some, called men of talents, because they could cull flowers and make long speeches, when they possessed nothing like solid mind, sound judgment, and but a very scanty share of common sense. I don't want to see this Hall filled with such characters; they would make dangerous legislators. I don't want to see the House of Representatives changed from a deliberative body to a talkative assembly. Sir, I want to see this Hall filled with solid mind, sound judgment, accompanied by a great portion of common sense, (which, by the by, is the best kind of sense in times of difficulty,) men of general information, liberal minds, and patriotic feelings. Such men can be had without bidding up so high. Patriotism, with the former pay of six dollars per day, together with the liberal travelling allowance of six dollars for every twenty miles in coming to and returning from the Seat of Government, will always fill your seats with such characters, with whom safety is to be found. If the people wish to have their business conducted in a safe and economical manner, having an eye to the perpetuation of civil liberty, they will send men here whose interest is the same as their's; they will send men here who will be advocates for liberality without extravagance.

I have thought proper to take this view of the subject; but in doing so I have had considerable difficulty to encounter from the extreme disorder arising from an over anxiety for the adoption of this weighty matter, and an apparent determination to prevent any member from expressing his sentiments; which disorder I take extremely unkind, as I am not in the habit of detaining the House often with long speeches. In the view I have thought proper to take of the subject, I have avoided personalities—not only because personalities ought to be avoided in deliberative bodies, but because it was in compliance with a rule I had laid down for myself in setting out in life, which was, never wantonly to wound the feelings of my fellow man, nor to suffer my own to be assailed with impunity.

Mr. CLAY (Speaker) said, he felt himself called upon to make a single observation on a part of his colleague's remarks. He was quite sure, he said, it was not the intention of his colleague to suggest anything like impropriety in the House in regard to the selection of the committee to whom this subject had been referred. But he rose to say, that two principles only had guided the officer, whose arduous and sometimes painful duty it was to select committees, in appointing the committee in question; the one was, to select a majority of the committee from the new members, who, being fresh from the people, might be supposed best to understand their views; the other, to distribute the committee, as much as possible, through the various parts of the continent. The question of their professions he did not inquire into, nor till this moment did he know it, and, he assured the Chair, he had not a knowledge of the views of a single member as to the compensation, except as to one member, (from Connecticut,) who had expressed his views respecting it by a vote which he gave at the last session, &c. Regarding the subject of this bill, Mr. C. said, he trusted he should not be found to occupy a single moment of the time of the House in discussing it. Every member had certainly by this time made up his mind on this subject, and he did not suppose that any argument here could have any effect on its decision. At the same time, he said, he should be sorry to see his worthy colleague, or any other member, restrained in the slightest degree from the exercise of the indubitable right he possesses, to offer his sentiments to the House.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, said, the gentleman ought not to attribute blame to him, if any there was, for urging the consideration of this bill. It was not taken up to-day on the suggestion of his own mind, but at the instance of other gentlemen. Nothing, Mr. H. said, could induce him to enter into the debate on this subject, which he knew would be to no purpose.

Mr. OGLE, of Pennsylvania, replied to a part of Mr. DESHA's remarks. He, too, represented farmers, but not men who wished persons to labor for them at a certain loss. Would any respectable farmer, himself, Mr. O. asked, agree to leave his farm to manage itself, when he knew that, if he did, that he and his family would become beggars? Certainly he would not—he pays those who work for him, and would expect to be paid himself for his sacrifices and labor in the discharge of public duties; and it was a correct principle, he added, that public officers should be paid for their services. In regard to the sort of talent necessary for Congress, Mr. O. suggested that a graduated scale of compensation might be made, if, by trepanning, the brains of all the members could be taken out, and their actual value ascertained by weight—in which case he did know but he might himself come in for small pay. But nine dollars a day, he humbly thought, was a compensation small enough for a just recompense for attendance here; and, though he represented farmers, he had never heard it suggested that that was too much. On this subject, Mr. O. said, he had no instructions from his constituents; he should vote, therefore, not for popularity, but for what he conscientiously believed was just. He most sincerely believed, he repeated, that men who served the public ought to be paid; and, he did not consider it a reasonable expectation that men were to devote their lives to this object purely from patriotism. He hoped, he said, putting these considerations out of view, that a majority of this committee would, on this occasion, give correct votes—not with a view to re-election, but to justice.

The question was then taken on striking out nine and inserting six, as the daily compensation, and negatived.

Mr. LINN, of New Jersey, then moved to strike out nine and insert eight; which motion was negatived by a small majority.

Mr. BASSETT, of Virginia, moved to strike out nine, and insert nothing; which would leave the bill open for any sum; which motion was negatived.

Mr. SOUTHARD, of New Jersey, then moved to reduce the allowance for travelling expenses, from nine to six dollars for each twenty miles; which motion was also negatived.

Some merely verbal amendments were made to the bill, and the Committee rose and reported the bill.

The bill being immediately taken up by the House—

Mr. PARRIS, of Massachusetts, moved to strike out the word nine, as applying both to compensation and to mileage, and to insert six, in lieu thereof.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, in explaining what would otherwise appear an inconsistency in the vote he was about to give, said, that he was aware that, in order to preserve in Congress talents of a proper grade, and to enable men of moderate property to come to Congress without loss, a higher compensation was necessary than had heretofore been allowed to members of Congress. But, said he, holding, as we do, the key of the Treasury, we ought not to do ourselves even justice before we do it to others, whose claims are stronger and of longer standing. Whenever justice was done to the sufferers in the war of the Revolution, and not until then, he should be prepared to do justice to ourselves.

Mr. ROSS required the yeas and nays on the question now pending.

On suggestion of Mr. COLSTON, of Virginia, the question was so divided, as to take it separately on the compensation and on the mileage.

Mr. OGLE said he should still vote as he had done in Committee, not allowing to the suggestion of the gentleman from Ohio the weight he attached to it. Every man showed his patriotism and generosity by personal acts; and, to accomplish the object that gentleman had spoken of, said Mr. O., I would distribute among these sufferers one half of my pay—and, whilst I have a loaf remaining, no poor, distressed soldier shall want one half of it. But, Mr. O. said, he well knew Government was able to pay all just claimants; and he would not, for his part, deny justice to one, because the country had hitherto neglected to do justice to others.

The question was then taken on striking out “nine” and inserting “six,” as the daily compensation of the members, and decided in the negative—yeas 68, nays 101, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Baldwin, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bellinger, Bennett, Blount, Boden, Boss, Burwell, Campbell, Comstock, Desha, Earle, Edwards, Ellicott, Gage, Harrison, Hendricks, Herbert, Herrick, Heister, Holmes, of Massachusetts, Huntington, Johnson, of Kentucky, Lewis, McLane, W. Compensation to Members.

H. OF R.

Mr. LITTLE, of Maryland, then moved to strike out "nine" and insert in lieu thereof "eight" dollars as the daily pay.

Mr. BASSETT said that he had voted against eight dollars in the Committee of the Whole, because he preferred six. He should now vote for eight, because he could not succeed in obtaining six.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, said that, as the travelling allowance had been reduced to six, the pay ought to be reduced to the same rate; for that certainly the travelling was the most laborious part of the duty to perform for those who lived at any distance from the Seat of Government.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, concurred entirely in the opinion that the travelling was the hardest part of the Representative's duty, in a pecuniary view, and for which members had not heretofore been sufficiently paid. There were occasions on which we were under an obligation to perform gratuitous services for our country; but surely this was not one of them. He too, he said, should vote for the reduction of the pay, because he hoped the mileage and the pay, whatever they were fixed at, would be at the same rate.

The question on reducing the daily pay from nine to eight dollars, was decided in the affirmative—yeas 99, nays 79, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Allen of Vermont, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Austin, Baldwin, Ball, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bateman, Bayley, Bellinger, Bennett, Bloomfield, Blount, Boden, Boss, Burwell, Campbell, Claiborne, Comstock, Cook, Crafts, Cruger, Desha, Drake, Earle, Edwards, Ellicott, Ervin of South Carolina, Floyd, Gage, Garnett, Hale, Harrison, Hendricks, Herbert, Herkimer, Herrick, Heister, Hitchcock, Holmes of Massachusetts, Huntington, Johnson of Kentucky, Lewis, Linn, Little, Livermore, McLane, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, Marr, Merrill, Moore, Morton, H. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, New, Parris, Peter, Pleasants, Poindexter, Porter, Quarles, Reed, Rhea, Rich, Richards, Robertson of Louisiana, Ross, Sampson, Savage, Scudder, Settle, Seybert, Shaw, Sherwood, S. Smith, Bal. NAYS—Messrs. So the daily pay was fixed at eight dollars.

15th CON. 1st Sess.—19

Mr. LITTLE then moved to reconsider the vote by which the travelling expenses had been reduced to six dollars, with a view to fix it at eight; which would make it stand on the same footing as heretofore, but at a little higher rate.

Mr. STROTHER, of Virginia, intimated, for the information of the House, that he meant, when he had an opportunity, to move to strike out eight dollars, and insert six, for the daily pay, and for reasons he assigned. His wish had been, he said, that ample compensation should be given for services rendered; that, in discharging their important duty, the members of this body should be able to support themselves independently.—Finding, however, that his views could not be accomplished, he would bend to what the House had been assured was public opinion; he would sacrifice the conviction of his mind to the momentary feeling of the country. It had been said, by a gentleman from Kentucky, (Mr. JOHNSON,) whose remarks would always have weight with him, that the duty of travelling was the most laborious a Representative had to perform. That gentleman, Mr. S. said, has had a wide experience. With industry unceasing, and honesty unsuspected, he has been for many years attending the duties of his station here—and his opinion is entitled to weight. If, therefore, six dollars was considered by the House as sufficient allowance for mileage, it was all-sufficient as a recompense to the members when stationary here. Being about to take a course, which, connected with his former votes, would, without explanation, assume the appearance of discrepancy—an idea he abhorred as an individual, or as a member—he had thought it his duty to make these remarks. They were drawn from him by the necessity, which every man in public life is under, to keep far from him the suspicion of a want of firmness, or of vacillating policy.

Mr. LITTLE thought it necessary, after what the gentleman had said, to show that such conduct as he had referred to was certainly not imputable to him, (Mr. L.) I did, indeed, vote to strike out nine and insert six, not that that sum accorded with my views, which were to fill up the blank for pay and that for mileage, each, with eight dollars. This was a matter of opinion, on which men must judge for themselves. Having himself acted consistently, he imputed no incorrect motives to others, and he hoped none would be imputed to him.

Mr. COMSTOCK, of New York, said he should vote in favor of the proposed reconsideration. His mind had arrived at the conclusion, that the compensation ought to be eight dollars per diem for attendance, and eight dollars for every twenty miles travel. When the question was between nine and six, he had voted to strike out nine, but with the wish that eight should be ultimately substituted for it.

Mr. HARRISON also favored the motion for reconsideration, which he supported by forcible arguments. Gentlemen living on the stage line, whose votes had carried the reduction from nine to six, were perfectly unapprized, he believed, of the expenses and labors of those who were obliged to travel wretched roads with their own horses, &c.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, declared himself of the opinion that the allowances for pay and for mileage ought to be the same. This principle had been long settled, approved, and acquiesced in; and he hoped would not now be varied. He hoped, therefore, gentlemen would not be deterred from voting for a reconsideration of the former vote on this point, by any consideration foreign to the merits of the question.

The question on reconsideration was then taken, and decided in the affirmative, and the allowance for mileage was fixed at eight dollars for every twenty miles, by a considerable majority.

Mr. STROTHER then rose to make the motion he had indicated, to strike out the word eight and insert six dollars, as the daily pay; but the motion was decided to be out of order, the House having already refused to insert the word six.

Some verbal amendments, involving no principle, but which produced considerable conversation, were then disposed of.

The question having been stated, "Shall the bill be engrossed and read a third time?"—

Mr. STORRS, of New York, said he should vote for the bill, embracing an allowance of eight dollars per day. In so doing, he sacrificed his own opinion, which was in favor of a higher sum. He was the more induced, however, to agree to vote for the rate of eight dollars, because no gentleman who was of the committee who reported that bill had expressed himself in favor of a lower rate of allowance than that now established by the bill, of eight dollars per day, and eight dollars for mileage.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, begged leave to correct the gentleman, for he had himself been in favor of six dollars per day, and six dollars for travelling allowance.

After an unsuccessful motion, by Mr. COBB, to adjourn, and an equally unsuccessful attempt by Mr. MORTON, to have the yeas and nays ordered on the question, the bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading to-morrow, without a division.

WEDNESDAY, January 7.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills from this House of the following titles, to wit: An act for the relief of Samuel Aikman, and an act for the relief of Joel Earwood; with amendments, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

The said amendments were read and severally referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

On motion of Mr. MERCER, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of causing to be printed the secret journals of the proceedings of the Congress of the United States, down to the Treaty of Peace in 1783, together with the correspondence of the Government of the United States with the Ministers and Agents thereof in foreign countries, down to the same period of time; and that the same committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of causing to be printed the journal of the General Convention which framed the Constitution of the United States, and that the committee have leave to report by bill or otherwise.—Messrs. MERCER, BALDWIN, FORSYTH, PLEASANTS, and SPENCER were appointed the committee.

On motion of Mr. P. P. BARBOUR, the House proceeded to the consideration of a report of the Committee of Pensions, adverse to the prayer of the petition of Edmund Brooke; which report Mr. B. moved to reverse.

This motion gave rise to considerable debate, in the course of which Mr. BARBOUR and Mr. MERCER opposed the report and Mr. RHEA supported it. The debate resulted in referring the report to a Committee of the Whole for further consideration.

Mr. RICH, of Vermont, after observing that it appeared to him the business of the session had so far progressed that the House should meet at the usual hour of eleven instead of twelve, made a motion to that effect.

This motion was opposed by Messrs. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, LIVERMORE, MERCER, and RHEA, who attributed the unusual progress of business at the present session to the time which that rule allowed to the committees to mature business for the consideration of the House, &c.; and was supported by Mr. RICH, who remarked that the House had sat later in consequence of the lateness of the hour of meeting, and that in fact no time was gained, but some inconvenience felt, from the present arrangement.

The motion was finally ordered to lie on the table.

CONTEMPT OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, rose, and addressed the House in the following words:

Mr. Speaker, I lay before the House a letter addressed and delivered to me by a person called Colonel John Anderson. That man has mistaken me much. Wherever I am known, at this place and in the country from whence I came, no attempt of the kind would have been made. I feel it a duty to lay the letter and the statement thereon, made by myself, before the House. My feelings are too much excited, nor would it be my duty to make any remarks on the subject. It is for the House to determine what shall be done.

The papers handed, by Mr. WILLIAMS to the Clerk, were then read as follows:

WASHINGTON, Jan. 6, 1818.

HONORED SEN: I return you thanks for the attention I received on my claims to pass so soon. Mr. Lee will hand you some claims from the River Raisin, which will pass through your honorable committee; and I have a wish that the conduct of the British in that country may be related in full on the floor of Congress; which will give you some trouble in making out the report, and supporting the same. I have now to request that you will accept of the small sum of five hundred dollars, as part pay, for the extra trouble I give you; I will present it to you so soon as I receive some from Government. This is confidential, that only you and me may know anything about it; or, in other words, I give it to you as a man and a mason—and hope you belong to that society. Sir, should it happen that you will not accept of this small sum, I request you will excuse me; if you do not accept, I wish you to drop me a few lines; if you accept, I wish no answer. I hope you will see my view on this subject; that it is for extra trouble.

I will make out a statement, and present the same to the committee, which will be supported by General Harrison, Colonel Johnson, Mr. Hulbard, Mr. Meigs, Postmaster General, Governor Cass's report as commissioner, and others. Relying on your honor as to keeping this a secret, and your exertions in passing these claims as soon as possible, I need not inform you, that we are as poor unfortunate orphan children, having no representation in Congress—so must look on your honorable body as our guardians. Pardon this liberty from a stranger.

I am, with high esteem, your most obedient and humble servant,

JOHN ANDERSON.

The Hon. LEWIS WILLIAMS.

After breakfast this morning, George, a servant, came into the dining room, and told me that a gentleman was in my room waiting to see me. I stepped into my room, and Colonel John Anderson was there. He handed me a letter, observing at the same time, that he had prepared that letter for me, and that, perhaps, it would require some explanation. I read over the letter with attention; and, having done so, observed to Colonel Anderson it was a very surprising communication. I then started to Mr. Wilson's room, immediately adjoining my own. When, in the act of opening my own door, he begged I would not show the letter. I made no reply to this, but stepped into Mr. Wilson's room, and asked him to do me the favor to walk into my room. This Mr. Wilson did, following on immediately behind me. After we had got into my room, in the presence of Colonel Anderson, I handed the letter to Mr. Wilson, and, observing that it was a very extraordinary communication, requested him to read it. When Mr. Wilson had read, or was nearly done reading, the letter, I told Colonel Anderson that I repelled, with indignation and contempt, the offer he made to me in the letter. Colonel Anderson said, he asked my pardon; that it was designed only as a small compensation for the extra trouble he expected to give the Committee of Claims in examining the claims from the Michigan Territory, and exposing the conduct of the British during the war; that it was foreign from his intention to attempt anything like a bribe; and requested me to burn the letter, or to give it to him. I told him I should do neither; that his offence was unpardonable, such as I could not forgive, and ordered him to leave the room instantly. Col. Anderson then begged pardon, and asked forgiveness with excessive earnestness. I told him I would listen to none of his apologies; that his offence was an attack upon the integrity of Congress generally, and upon mine personally and particularly; that no one should ever have my pardon, or expect my forgiveness, who should suppose me capable of such an influence as he had attempted to practise upon me. Again, I told Colonel Anderson to leave my room. He advanced to the door, where he stood for some time, endeavoring to obtain my pardon, as he said. I told him it was in vain to ask it; that, as a member of Congress and of the Committee of Claims, it was my duty to examine his claims, and, if just, support them; if unjust, oppose them; that his offer was an attempt to influence my mind in opposition to my duty, and, as such, could not be forgiven. He then desired me either to burn the letter, or give it to him. I replied that I should do neither, and again ordered him to leave my room. Whereupon, he did leave the room. Mr. Wilson, after talking on the subject of the letter for some time, suggested to me the propriety of calling in Mr. William P. Maclay. I stepped to his room; but, as Mr. William P. Maclay was not in, I asked Mr. William Maclay, the room-mate of Mr. William P. Maclay, to come to my room. He complied with my request; and, shortly after he arrived in my room, Mr. William P. Maclay also stepped in. These gentlemen, Messrs. Wilson, William Maclay, and William P. Maclay, were in my room at the time the servant called to Mr. Wilson, and said a gentleman was below wishing to see him. Mr. Wilson walked out of the room, and was gone a few minutes. After he returned, he observed that Colonel Anderson was the person who had sent for him; that Colonel Anderson's business was to obtain his interference to put a stop to further proceedings on the subject of his letter to me. The precise conversation between Mr. Wilson and Colonel Anderson can be related by the former with minuteness.

LEWIS WILLIAMS.

JANUARY 7, 1818.

The papers having been read through, Mr. W. WILSON, of Pennsylvania, referred to in the above narrative, handed in a statement of the facts which fell under his observation, entirely corroborating those stated by Mr. WILLIAMS, as far as they came under the observation of the former.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, moved that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Speaker do issue his warrant, directed to the Sergeant-at-Arms attending the House, commanding him to take into custody, wherever to be found, the body of John Anderson, and the same in his custody to keep, subject to the further order and direction of this House.

Mr. HARRISON, of Ohio, rose in consequence of his name having been referred to in Colonel Anderson's letter. He had met with Colonel Anderson, he said, in the course of his military service, and had always heard him regarded as a highly respectable man; and well knowing his services, and the sufferings of his family, during the war, he had felt a warm interest in his favor. In the course of this morning, Colonel Anderson had sent for him and his friend, Colonel Johnson, out of the House, and, with all the agitation belonging to terror or to conscious guilt, had informed them of his having done an act which he feared would be regarded, as Mr. H. was sure it would by every member, as calling for the severest animadversion. They had informed him, Mr. H. said, that they would not justify his conduct; nor, were it brought before the House, could they say anything in extenuation of it.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, expressed his sincere regret on account of the occurrence which had just taken place, not on account of the individual implicated—though, surely, he was to be pitied—but on account of the gentleman from North Carolina, who, on this occasion, had taken that course dictated by a just sense of his own honor and the dignity of his official station; and on account of the suffering inhabitants of Detroit and Michigan, generally, that they should have misplaced their confidence in one, whom, until this day, Mr. J. said, he had himself held in the highest estimation. It must have been infamy of motive, or the grossest ignorance of the nature of the Representative character that could have produced this unwarrantable conduct.

Mr. TERRY, of Connecticut, inquired whether, according to our forms of proceedings, and to our Constitutional provisions, a general warrant, as proposed, could be issued? Was it not opposed, in itself, in its nature, to the principles of civil liberty?

The SPEAKER observed that, in the practice of the House, happily, instances were extremely rare, where such a warrant became necessary; no such case had occurred within his observation. But there could be no doubt, when an offence was committed against the privileges or dignity of the House, it was perfectly in its power to issue a warrant to apprehend the party offending.

Mr. FORSYTH turned to a case on record—and he was sorry there was such a case on record—where this proceeding had taken place, in the year 1795, in which a bribe in land had been offered to one or more members. Mr. F. then confirmed his motion to the terms of that precedent, as above stated, from which it had before a little varied.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, asked, for information merely, whether the fact on which the warrant was to be issued, should not first be substantiated by oath. The statement came, he knew, from a most respectable source; but was not an oath necessary to justify such a warrant?

The SPEAKER said—Certainly not.

The question on Mr. FORSYTH's motion was then taken, decided in the affirmative, and ordered to be entered unanimously.

The warrant was forthwith issued.

COMPENSATION TO MEMBERS.

The order of the day being announced for the third reading of the bill on this subject, Mr. HARRISON said, he was persuaded that the members of this House who had voted for a compensation beyond the ancient allowance of six dollars, had voted under great embarrassment, pressed as they were on the one hand by a sense of duty and of justice, and on the other by that delicacy which must be felt when they were acting as judges in their own cause. He thought, however, that there was a mode by which their feelings would be saved, and which, if adopted, would be as highly acceptable to the people as it would be honorable to their representatives. It would evince a disinterestedness and magnanimity which could not fail to produce the most happy effects, and finally fix the compensation at the sum which their disinterested judgments should deem right. Being satisfied that it was a question to be determined rather by feeling than argument, he would say no more, but submit a resolution to recommit the bill, with instructions to amend it so as to fix the compensation for the present Congress at six dollars, and for the ensuing Congress at eight dollars.

On suggestion of Mr. MILLER, of South Carolina, the question was so divided as to be first taken on recommitment simply, without instructions.

Mr. WILLIAMS, of North Carolina, said, he hoped the motion made by the gentleman from Ohio would prevail; the occurrences of this morning would prevent him from taking so much share in the advocacy of this motion as he would otherwise do. But, said he, notwithstanding my indisposition, notwithstanding the late excitement of my feelings, I cannot permit this motion to be decided without offering my reasons in favor of it. The principal reason now offered in favor of the bill is, that the depreciation of money makes it necessary to increase the compensation of members. On this point let one fact be stated. During the period of the thirteenth Congress, a proposition was made to increase the pay of members. The reason assigned at that time in favor of the motion was one of those we now hear—the depreciation of money. But if my recollection serves me, that proposition was almost unanimously rejected. The depreciation of money was then at its height, if the term can be applied to such a state of things; and if the depreciation of money had no effect on that decision, surely it can have none now. Since then money has appreciated—the banks now pay specie for their notes; commerce flows in its ordinary channels; the necessities of life are to be purchased at a cheaper rate than formerly; and in every respect the measure never was less called for since its first agitation than it is at present. Another reason in favor of recommitting the bill for the purpose of reducing the amount of compensation to be allowed to members is, that when the subject was tried at the first session of the last Congress, many gentlemen conceived it indelicate to vote money into their own pockets; no one could suppose that the members who composed the House at that time, would vote more money into their own pockets than they honestly thought they, as well as every subsequent Congress, were entitled to receive. But, notwithstanding my full conviction of the disinterestedness of every gentleman on that occasion, I did feel a delicacy on the subject which alone would have restrained me from voting in favor of the proposed increase. I would oppose the present increase on the same ground. Questions of this sort must be determined by every gentleman's own feelings. What I could do another might refuse; and what he could do with perfect freedom I might object to. The feelings of a gentleman must be his only guide; and as they belong exclusively to himself, no one has a right to interfere with his determination. The argument which has always been offered in support of the increase of pay, is founded on the supposition of a principle entirely too selfish. Our constituents have seen the fallacy of it. If a man enters the public service when the compensation is eight dollars a day, but would abstain from that service when the compensation is only six, it is evident that money, and not the good of the country, may be considered the governing motive. How much this will detract from that high value, that reverential regard in which patriotic labors have ever been held, I shall not now undertake to describe. The public service, in every age and country, at least in every republican age and country, must be attended by some sacrifice of personal ease or individual emolument. Without this, why should the disinterestedness of the patriots of ancient and modern times have ever been so celebrated? I do not mean to impeach the motives of gentlemen in voting for this bill. Their motives in voting for this bill, and every other bill on this floor, must be considered honorable and correct. I mean, therefore, only to say, that the argument adduced in support of the bill is founded, as I think, on the supposition of a principle entirely too selfish; and that in it I can see no room for the exercise of those virtues which have distinguished the illustrious men of every age and country. I, sir, have always been in favor of six dollars; when the question was brought before us at the first session, and also at the second session of the last Congress, I was opposed to the increase of pay. I see at the present session no reason for changing the vote heretofore given; and I hope that the bill allowing eight dollars will be recommitted, for the express purpose of allowing to members only six. These, with some other remarks not heard, were delivered by Mr. W. in opposition to the bill, and in favor of the recommitment.

Mr. Cobb, of Georgia, said that he too was in favor of a recommitment of the bill, but not for the reasons suggested by the gentleman from North Carolina. Nor could he conceive upon what foundation it could be urged, as a reason for reducing the daily pay to six dollars, that to make it a higher sum was voting money into their own pockets. The fact being that there was now in existence no law on the subject, the matter stood precisely in the same situation as when it was taken up by the first Congress under the Constitution. The question then is, said Mr. C., as if we were legislating for the first time on the subject, what is the proper compensation? I have no fear, said Mr. C., of being charged with voting money into my pocket. The Constitution contains a provision requiring us to fix our own compensation; and, in the part of the country which I represent, it is expected that the Representative of the people shall vote for such a compensation as he ought reasonably to receive. On this subject, as on all others, Mr. C. said he should, as expressed by a gentleman some days ago, vote exactly according to his own opinion. He felt himself trammelled by no instructions, by no expression of public opinion. Perhaps, he said, it was a happy thing for him that he represented a State where this doctrine of the right and obligation of instruction was out of the question. In that State, the Representative in the Legislature of the State is sworn to act according to his own judgment; and, Mr. C. said, he did not suppose that he was sent to this body on any different principle. He should vote to recommit the bill, he said, on the ground that the compensation it allowed was too small, in favor of which position he could adduce a great number of reasons. Most of them were old and hacknied, it was true; therefore it was not necessary to go over them in detail. But he certainly thought them very strong. He called upon any gentleman, for instance, who was in his situation, and, in so doing, he called upon a majority of the House, whether he would say that six dollars per day were a sufficient compensation? Putting out of view the argument that a sufficient compensation was necessary to put the members beyond the reach of Executive influence; putting aside the consideration that persons low in fortune ought to be enabled to come here, let us see, said Mr. C., whether there be not a stronger reason for an augmented compensation. I, said he, am a married man. To be sure I do not wish the public to support the whole of my family; but if I were to say I did not wish my wife to come with me to the session, it would be the same as if I were to say I am ashamed of my wife. Unless gentlemen similarly situated were prepared to say this, he could not see why they should be squeamish in allowing themselves a little of something to maintain their wives. If any gentleman situated as himself would make a calculation of what it would cost him to bring his wife here, not every session, but at every other session—and that was little enough in all conscience—he would find that six dollars per day would leave him in debt. Calculating the compensation at eight dollars per day, a member bringing his wife only with him would find, that, after paying his and her board, that of a servant and the horses that brought them here, he would have but six dollars per week left for his contingent expenses. He would ask any man of common feeling, he had almost said of common sense, whether six dollars a week was anything like sufficient for that object? A man, to keep within his allowance, must at once make up his mind to immure his wife, to shut her from the face of day, because he cannot afford to put her in an apparel fit to appear abroad. This reasoning, Mr. C. said, might appear novel; but it was nevertheless true. A gentleman who had no family, wife or child, would at the same rate have a surplus of thirty dollars a week for his clothing and contingent expenses; and, Mr. C. asked, whether this was more than sufficient for the necessary expenses of any gentleman—a term, which he hoped, was well understood in the House. His opinion was, that the compensation contained in the bill was too small even for a single man, but certainly for a man with a family. He was therefore in favor of recommitment; but under a hope that so far from reducing the compensation to six dollars, it would be increased to nine for a single man, and twelve for a gentleman who will bring his family with him. In expressing this hope, he said, he had another view. Some gentlemen appeared to be very fond of serving in this House from patriotism, pure patriotism. If there should be any gentleman who wished, under this consideration, not to take nine dollars, Mr. C. wished him to be authorized to take just as much less as he pleased, and leave it to those who were willing to take more, to fight it out with their constituents. Mr. C. said he was willing to leave that matter with his constituents; if they believed him right, they would return him here again; if otherwise, no doubt they would leave him out, and he should retire to a business which was infinitely more profitable to him than that of a legislator at nine dollars per day.

The question was then taken on the motion to recommitt the bill, and decided in the negative—ayes only 47.

The bill to fix the compensation of Senators, Representatives, and Delegates in Congress, was then read a third time; and the question having been stated, "Shall the bill pass?"

Mr. MOSELEY, of Connecticut, said he did not rise for the purpose of detaining the House with a speech on the present bill; so far from it, he rejoiced at the prospect of its being disposed of without a protracted debate, for he believed no possible good could result from it. The subject was as well understood as it ever could be. Gentlemen who were members of the last Congress must surely be satisfied with the long and tedious discussion which then took place; and gentlemen now present, who were not then members, he presumed were no less familiar with the subject, and some of them perhaps in situations to obtain more useful light and knowledge upon it than those confined within these walls. But, while he rejoiced at the prospect of a decision of this question without another Winter's debate, he regretted extremely that the honorable gentleman from Kentucky (Mr. DESHA) should suppose that there existed a disposition in the House to press the bill through with too great precipitation, and without due deliberation. Mr. M. considered the power confided to Congress by the Constitution of determining the compensation for their services as the last which should be abused; and he said he should be as unwilling as any gentleman to give his vote for a compensation which he should deem extravagant. He voted for the bill as reported by the committee, and he was satisfied with it in its present state. A dollar more or less could not greatly affect the Treasury, nor vary the fortunes of those who might be entitled to receive it. And as it respects those gentlemen who seem to think six dollars per day the only suitable compensation for members of Congress to receive at all times and under all circumstances, he rejoiced, on their account, that the variation from that sum was no greater, because honorable gentlemen in the minority, should the bill pass, would no doubt feel themselves as much bound by its provisions as though it had met with their entire approbation; and in proportion as the amount should exceed what, in their estimation, was just and right, must be their regret at being compelled to receive it.

Mr. DESHA, of Kentucky, rose, in justification of his remark, on yesterday, that the bill had been hurried to its passage. He had, he said, done ample justice to the House, and he wished he could say, with the same truth, that the House had done the same justice to him. So far from this, however, Mr. D. said, he never witnessed in this House before so great a degree of indecorum and impropriety towards any member. He wished not to wound the feelings of any one, but he must most pointedly censure the treatment extended to him yesterday. Had he been singled out for rudeness by any individual member, he should have no difficulty how to proceed—man could always meet man—but that was not the case. Mr. D. then proceeded to remark on the bill itself, and said there was no good reason for increasing the compensation at this time, at so extravagant a rate. The plea of the depreciation of money was much weaker now than it was four or five years ago, when a proposition to increase the pay of the members was laughed out of countenance; and, for his part, Mr. D. said, he felt it a great indelicacy, believing as he did, that it was unnecessary, to vote to themselves this high compensation. Six dollars, he maintained, was a sufficient compensation; and he was still of opinion that the people would not be satisfied at the pay being raised above that sum. After repeating more at large some of his arguments of yesterday, Mr. D. said, that he himself represented a people as liberal and as high minded as any others in the Union, and he was certain they disapproved an addition to the former compensation.

Mr. STRONG, of Massachusetts, commenced his remarks by the observation that it was enough for any man to answer for his own faults, without taking on his shoulders those of others. He regretted, he said, that the gentleman from Kentucky had been three times interrupted in his speech yesterday, by disorder in the House. He regretted that the gentleman had declared so, and that a true report of his speech had gone abroad. Was not this, Mr. S. asked, a disgrace to the House? Was it true? Except a little interruption when the gentleman rose, by the call for the question, (which he presumed it was the right of every gentleman to make,) Mr. S. said, the disturbance had been entirely in the gentleman's own imagination. Not only, however, would the report of yesterday's debate circulate through the papers, but of this day's also, in which the statement had been repeated. If true, said Mr. S., we ought to bear it; if not, we ought not to submit to the imputation. What is the representation which goes abroad to the people? Why, that, whilst debating about fixing our own compensation at a rate enormously high, as the gentleman had stated, this House had been so lost to a sense of its own dignity, as not to suffer a member to speak in opposition to it, Mr. S. was not willing that this representation should go out to the public uncontradicted.

Mr. OGLE, of Pennsylvania, said, he should, in voting against this bill, fortify himself by a strong authority, wherein we learn that a man who will not provide for his own household, is worse than an infidel, and one who denies the faith. Was he, he asked, to sit here and destroy the comfort of his own family? If Congress had, in 1791, fixed the compensation at six dollars per day, when they were living in Philadelphia at a board of perhaps four dollars per week, nine was certainly as small an allowance as ought now to be made. Mr. O. said, he should vote against the bill, because he did not believe he should do himself justice by taking eight dollars per day. If, in consequence of his vote, the bill perchance should fail, Mr. O. said, he could afford to spend this Winter here for nothing; like the old veterans of the Revolution, they fought for nothing, said he, and surely we can afford to sit here for nothing. If gentlemen were conscientiously to examine and express their own feelings, divested of every extraneous consideration, Mr. O. said, he was satisfied that there was at this moment a majority of the House who did not think nine dollars per day too great a compensation. Would a farmer, a hirer of laborers, expect men to work for him for nothing, because he was a great and rich man, merely for the honor of being his servants? Certainly not; nor, did Mr. O. believe, that the people of the United States wanted their representatives to come here and work for them for nothing. Gentlemen talked about public opinion. Why, he said, if you walk through a meadow, in which there are fifty bullocks and fifty grasshoppers, you will find the grasshoppers make the most noise. This was the case with the public opinion they were told of—it was not the opinion of the solid people of the United States. Call at the grogshops, and you may find it; but, call at the house of a real farmer, who earns his bread by the sweat of his brow, and he will tell you he wants no man to come here and serve him for nothing.

Mr. DESHA rose, and adverted to what had fallen from Mr. STRONG, which he thought required explanation. He wished to know whether that gentleman meant to intimate that he (Mr. DESHA) had yesterday or to-day intentionally stated what was not correct?

Mr. STRONG said, he meant to state nothing of the gentleman's intentions. He meant to say that he thought the House, on yesterday, remarkably attentive to the gentleman's remarks, and he appealed to every other gentleman of the House whether the fact was not so. If it was so, said Mr. S., ought we to suffer the imputation to the contrary to go forth? I did not mean to say, said Mr. S., that the gentleman said what was not true, but that he had stated what appeared to me not to be the fact.

The question on the passage of the bill was then decided, as follows:

YEAS—Messrs. Abbott, Adams, Allen of Massachusetts, Allen of Vermont, Anderson of Pennsylvania, Anderson of Kentucky, Austin, Ball, Barber of Ohio, Bateman, Bayley, Beecher, Bloomfield, Bryan, Butler, Clagett, Claiborne, Colston, Comstock, Cook, Crafts, Crawford, Cruger, Culbreth, Cushman, Darlington, Drake, Earle, Ellicott, Floyd, Forney, Forsyth, Fuller, Gage, Garnett, Hale, Hall of Delaware, Hall of North Carolina, Herkimer, Hitchcock, Hogg, Holmes of Connecticut, Hopkinson, Hubbard, Hunter, Irving of New York, Johnson of Kentucky, Jones, Kinsey, Kirtland, Lawyer, Linn, Little, Lowndes, W. Maclay, W. P. Maclay, McCoy, Marchand, Mason of Massachusetts, Merrill, Middleton, Moore, Moseley, Jeremiah Nelson, H. Nelson, T. M. Nelson, Nesbitt, Orr, Owen, Palmer, Parrott, Patterson, Pawling, Peter, Pindall, Pitkin, Pleasants, Porter, Rich, Richards, Ringgold, Robertson of Kentucky, Robertson of Louisiana, Ruggles, Savage, Schuyler, Scudder, Settle, Slocumb, Alexander Smyth, Spangler, Speed, Storrs, Strong, Stuart, Tallmadge, Tarr, Terrill, Terry, Tompkins, Townsend, Tucker of Virginia, Upham, Walker of North Carolina, Wallace, Wendover, Williams of New York, Wilkin, and Wilson of Pennsylvania—109.

NAYS—Messrs. Baldwin, Barbour of Virginia, Bassett, Bellinger, Bennett, Blount, Boden, Boss, Burwell, Campbell, Cobb, Desha, Edwards, Ervin of S. Carolina, Folger, Harrison, Hasbrouck, Hendricks, Herbert, Herrick, Heister, Holmes of Massachusetts, Huntington, Lewis, Livermore, McLane, Marr, Mercer, Miller, Morton, Mumford, Murray, New, Ogle, Parris, Poindexter, Quarles, Reed, Rhea, Ross, Sampson, Sawyer, Shaw, Sherwood, Silsbee, S. Smith, B. Smith, J. S. Smith, Southard, Spencer, Strother, Taylor, Trimble, Tucker of South Carolina, Tyler, Walker of Kentucky, Whiteside, Whitman, Williams of Connecticut, and Williams of North Carolina—60.

So the bill was passed, (at eight dollars per day and eight dollars mileage,) and sent to the Senate for concurrence.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS.

On motion of Mr. PARRIS, of Massachusetts, the House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill making further appropriation for repairing the public buildings.

Mr. P. explained the occasion of the introduction of the bill for a partial appropriation, which was to cover arrearages which required payment, and to make a partial appropriation for going on with the works, &c. He moved to fill the blank for the amount of appropriation, as instructed by the select committee, with $200,000.

Mr. BURWELL, of Virginia, said he should have been much gratified to have seen something in the shape of estimates to sustain this appropriation. He adverted to the various appropriations heretofore made, and the necessity of some definitive system which should set a limit to expenditure, and prevent future claims for arrearages.

Mr. PARRIS said, in reply, that the amount of arrearages was about $80,000. The reason why no estimate was now produced was, that, at the last session, a very minute calculation had been made of the necessary expenditure, and, judging from the President's house, (the cost of which had been less than the estimate,) that calculation had been uncommonly correct. The committee had many objects before them, on which they wished to make a general report; but what was now wished was, that enough should be appropriated to pay the arrearages, and to meet the expenditures which should be necessary during the present session, before the latter part of which the general appropriation bill would probably not pass. If the select committee had proposed too large an appropriation now, nothing was easier, if gentlemen chose, than to reduce the amount.

The proposed sum was agreed to, and the Committee rose and reported the bill to the House; and it was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading.

JUDICIAL RECORDS, &c.

The House then again went into a Committee of the Whole, on the bill to give effect to the judicial records and proceedings of one State in other States, Mr. FORSYTH'S motion to strike out the second section being still under consideration—

Mr. F. advocated his motion at some length, in which he was briefly supported by Mr. STORRS; and the motion was opposed much at large by Mr. BALDWIN, and supported at some length by Mr. LIVERMORE. At a late hour before the question was taken, the Committee rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

THURSDAY, January 8.

Another member, to wit: from New York, DAVID A. OGDEN, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

The SPEAKER presented petitions from sundry inhabitants of the Territory of Missouri, praying that the said Territory may be erected into a State, and admitted into the Union; on an equal footing with the original States.—Laid on the table.

Mr. PLEASANTS, from the Committee on Naval Affairs, reported a bill authorizing John Taylor to be placed on the list of navy pensioners; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole.

On motion of Mr. LINN, a committee was appointed to inquire into the expediency of establishing by law, a standard of weights and measures; and Messrs. LINN, PITKIN, SEYBERT, LOWNDES, and OGDEN, were appointed the committee.

The following resolution submitted by Mr. WALKER, of North Carolina, was read and ordered to lie on the table:

Resolved, That it is expedient to inquire whether any, and if any, what alteration is necessary in the several laws now in force, to make a further provision for the purpose of issuing warrants to the soldiers of the late Army of the United States, in order to obtain their patents for their military bounty lands, promised to them at their enlistment; and that this subject be submitted to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. LIVERMORE submitted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the Committee on Private Land Claims be instructed to inquire, whether, in any case, further time than is already prescribed by law ought to be allowed for the redemption of lands sold for direct taxes, and purchased by collectors in behalf of the United States, pursuant to law.

On motion of Mr. POINDEXTER, the said resolution was amended by directing the inquiry to be made by the Committee on Private Land Claims.

On motion of Mr. RICH, the said resolution was then further amended, by adding thereto the following:

"And that the said committee be also instructed to inquire into the expediency of making provision by law, to enable persons whose lands may have been sold for the payment of the direct tax, to redeem the same by paying such sum only, as said lands shall be justly charged with, together with reasonable costs and interest."

The resolution was then agreed to as amended.

An engrossed bill, entitled "An act making further provision for repairing the public buildings," was read the third time and passed.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed bills of the following titles, to wit: "An act to provide for paying to the State of Indiana three per cent. of the net proceeds, arising from the sales of the United States' lands within the same; "An act to allow the benefit of drawback on merchandise transported by land conveyance, from Bristol to Boston, and from Boston to Bristol, in like manner as if the same were transported coastwise;" in which bills they ask the concurrence of this House.

The first of the said bills from the Senate was read twice, and referred to the Committee on the Public Lands.

The last mentioned bill from the Senate was read twice, and referred to the Committee of Ways and Means.

CASE OF COLONEL ANDERSON.

The SPEAKER having apprized the House that the Sergeant-at-Arms had taken the body of John Anderson, pursuant to the warrant to him directed, and held him in custody, Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, submitted for consideration the following resolution:

Resolved, That a Committee of Privileges, to consist of seven members, be appointed, and that the said committee be instructed to report a mode of proceeding in the case of John Anderson, who was taken into custody yesterday by order of the House; and that the same committee have leave to sit immediately.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, rose in opposition to this proceeding. The offence of this man, in every sense but a legal one, he was not disposed to deny. But it was another question, whether the House was justified in the course it was about to pursue. Was any authority therefor given in the Constitution? None. Was any law to be found on the statute-book giving it? None. The mode of punishing bribery was, to resort to a court of justice, and there only could it be punished. In this House, he said, it was impossible to proceed correctly in a trial for an offence of this character; and the trouble proceedings of this kind would impose on the House, and the evil of delay they would cause in their ordinary legislative business, afforded strong reasons, if others were wanting, to consult their authority, and see whether in fact the House possessed any authority to act on the case. The fifth section of the first article of the Constitution, he said, provided that each House might determine the rules of its own proceedings; but no part of the Constitution gave to the House authority to arrest and bring forward any individual for improper conduct to any member of this House. The courts of the country had made, in their practice, what is called a common law; but, Mr. B. said, if there existed any common law to justify these proceedings of the House, it was unknown to him. The great powers assumed by the Parliament of Great Britain in this respect, had been a matter of great complaint in that country; and he presumed it would not be contended that the practice of that body was to form a rule of conduct for this House. Neither, Mr. B. said, did he think it essential that this House should possess the power of arresting and bringing individuals to trial before us; the courts of justice being open to prosecution and redress for any injury of this sort. The House, as any other legislative body, possessed inherently the power to protect itself from indecorum and insult; but it had no power to confine and commit individuals for acts done elsewhere. He did not believe the House possessed authority to arrest an individual in this case, any more than for an assault and battery on a member at any distance from the Seat of Government—a power which, he contended, the House did not possess. In another part of the Constitution, he said, particular privileges were accorded to members; and the enumeration of particular powers, in any instrument of that character, was an exclusion of all others. For other injuries received, than those in violation of that clause of the Constitution, Mr. B. said, members have the same redress as any other individuals. Mr. B. said, he did not believe the House ought to have the power it was about to exercise; the Constitution had not given the House any such power, nor had it been conferred upon them by any law.

Mr. FOSYTH said, if the position of the gentlemen was correct, the House had already violated the Constitution. The object of the proposed appointment of a committee was to inquire how the House ought now to proceed. If the committee concur with the gentleman from Ohio, they would report that the individual now in custody ought to be discharged; if otherwise, they would report what further course the House ought to pursue. But, Mr. F. said, admitting that all the gentleman had said was true, it was no reason why this committee should not be appointed. Mr. F. did not wish to be understood as doubting the power of the House, because he believed it had full power to proceed; and he knew that this House and the other branch of the Legislature had, in other cases, exercised similar powers. Until he was convinced, by solemn investigation, that the House did not possess the power, he would not, for one, consent to refrain from its exercise in the present case.

Mr. LIVERMORE, of New Hampshire, hoped, he said, that but one resolution would pass the House on this occasion, and that that one should be, that John Anderson be discharged. First, he said, on account of the irregularity of the proceeding in the first instance. Our ideas, said he, of Congressional privileges, appear to rest on our knowledge of British Parliamentary privileges; which, he conceived, were widely distinct in their natures. In Great Britain the Legislature possesses all power; and almost every act of the Parliament becomes a part of the Constitution of the land. That is an unlimited Legislature. The Congress of the United States, he said, was differently constituted. In a case of this kind occurring in Great Britain, an oath would not be required; but, said Mr. L., we are, in this respect, restricted in our power by the express declaration in the Constitution, that no warrant shall issue except sustained by oath. This provision, he said, being contained in the fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution, had more weight with him than if contained in the original instrument, having been the result of the after-thought and mature deliberation of the nation. Far be it from him, Mr. L. said, to suggest that full faith should not be given to anything advanced by the honorable member from North Carolina; as a man he believed him implicitly, but as a member not at all—no more than, as a judge, he would believe a man in court without an oath. The word of the Chief Justice of the United States himself would not be taken in court except on oath. Mr. L. said he greatly respected the gentleman he had referred to, but he did not consider the House at liberty to take a step which would compromise the meanest man in the United States, except on the oath of his accuser. Besides, said Mr. L., we have no authority over John Anderson, admitting the charge against him to be substantiated. There is no statute of the United States, though there are in most of the individual States, declaring bribery an offence. Far be it from me to contend that this body cannot protect itself; that we can do by our own rules and regulations, but we cannot extend them beyond the verge of this House. The Sergeant-at-Arms might command the whole military force of the United States, could it possibly become necessary, to put out of this House a man disturbing its peace. Mr. L. said, he knew very well there was a precedent on record of a course similar to that now proposed; and he also knew that the most eminent men of the United States deprecated that decision when it took place. When the subject was before the Congress, in 1800, he believed those who favored the proceeding sustained themselves on the authority of the practice of the British Parliament; they were a high-handed party majority, full of British notions, and fond of British precedents. Those who were opposed to that course were the whole body of the Republican members, with the great Jefferson at their head. Mr. L. hoped, he repeated, that but one resolution would pass on this occasion; and that it should be, that the warrant for the apprehension of John Anderson had been irregularly and improperly issued, and that he be therefore forthwith discharged.

Mr. TUCKER, of Virginia, said he should not do his duty, if he did not, on the present question, give the gentleman from Georgia his hearty support; not that he was certain he should give him the same support in all his views of this subject. The proper course, in the opinion of Mr. T., would be, to provide by a general law for the punishment of contempts against either House of Congress; but, he asked, was it not the duty of the House on this, and on every other occasion, to deliberate in that manner which afforded the best lights on any subject, and which it became the dignity of the House to pursue? No matter how light the subject might be that was proposed to the consideration of the House, he should not choose to act on it, without calling on some committee of the House to take it into their particular consideration, and to produce a clear and connected view of it. And was this an occasion on which, by a hasty procedure, to depart from that course? Would the House at once declare that its members might be approached by the vilest miscreants on the face of the globe, and that it could take no steps to protect their rights? Is any member prepared to say, that there exists in this House no power to repel the approaches of bribery and corruption? The Constitution creating this body is a dead letter—is mere waste paper—said Mr. T., if we have no power to protect ourselves from violence of this description in the exercise of our duties. That part of the Constitution giving to Congress all power necessary to carry into effect the delegated powers, has no value, if it does not apply to the present case. For his part, Mr. T. said, he had no manner of doubt as to the power of this House to protect itself, and none of the expediency of the course now proposed. But, at the same time, he doubted the propriety of suffering the laws to remain in their present situation, so as to compel the House to act in this way. Until a general law should pass, Mr. T. said, he had no doubt the House had the power within itself to punish any person who should attempt to bribe one of its members. The proper course, he conceived would be, warned by this incident, to appoint a committee to report a bill to punish such offences, &c. He should not commit himself at present as to the final course for the House; but it appeared to him that every member, from the necessity the House was under of protecting itself, would wish to see that course pursued which would best promote a due consideration of the subject—which was the usual process of referring the subject to a committee.

Mr. HOPKINSON, of Pennsylvania, rose in support of the proposition before the House. This question, he said, was not a new one; it had been heretofore solemnly debated and adjudged; and all the objections now expressed had been brought forward in their greatest force, without effect; and the precedent then established was entitled to respect. In that case to which he referred, it was well known a full opportunity was given for the freest discussion; the parties arraigned at the bar having been heard by their counsel on this question. But, Mr. H. said, the weight of that precedent was attempted to be destroyed in a most extraordinary manner by the honorable gentleman from New Hampshire, who had intimated that the House at that day did not decide the question on a knowledge of the provisions of the Constitution, but on party principles. Mr. H. begged the gentleman from New Hampshire to tell the House how he knew the motives of the members of that Congress; how he acquired the power to enter their hearts, and see that they did not decide this question on our own laws, but on those of a foreign country? Why did he seek to condemn them and their decision, by a sort of allusion, which, Mr. H. said, as an argument, would not be listened to on this floor? That respectable and enlightened Congress, Mr. H. said, had decided the question before them on the principles of our own Constitution and law; if their decision was corroborated by the practice of the Legislature of any other country, there was nothing in that circumstance to weaken the force of the precedent. But the Republican members opposed that decision! Are questions of this sort, Mr. H. asked, to be decided by the particular political denominations of those who voted pro or con? Is that to be the rule by which decisions on such questions are to be received or regarded as precedents? If so, as gentlemen took the liberty sometimes of exchanging sides in politics, that which was law to-day might not be to-morrow; and the question would be forever unsettled. The question now raised, Mr. H. considered as having been decided by an authority which though not decisive, was yet entitled to the highest respect, and ought to be respected. The observations of the gentleman from New Hampshire having been disposed of, which ought never to have been made, Mr. H. proceeded to notice some other views which had been thrown out. It had been objected to the legality of the procedure, that the statement on which the warrant was founded, was not on oath. Was not the representation of a member of this House, he asked, a sufficient ground of proceeding? The character of this House must be sunk to a low ebb, if the representations of its members were not to be received as true. In the case of Randall and Whitney, the proceedings of the House had been similar to those of this day; information of the facts was given by members in their places, and the House proceeded, as in the present case, without calling on the members to take the book and testify that what they had stated was true. In such cases, said Mr. H., we have ever been guided by precedent, and we have done right. But, it was said by the gentleman from Ohio, that there was nothing to be found in the Constitution to justify this proceeding. When, Mr. H. said, the Constitution gave being to this body, it gave to it every attribute necessary to its security and to its purity. The courts of justice, which had been mentioned, do exercise similar power; any attempt to obstruct the due course of justice, or to corrupt its source, is an offence punishable in a summary manner. It was equally necessary such a power should reside in this House; because, if persons hanging about this hall, with their private claims, and besetting the paths of the members, offering them bribes for their votes and influence, were to be referred to the courts of justice for their punishment, there was no protection for the independence, none for the feelings, none for the character of this House. If we are careful that the laws be purely administered, ought we not to be equally so that they are purely made? Is the juror who administers the law to have protection, and the legislator who makes the law to have none? That the courts have the power to punish contempts, is a matter, said Mr. H., which could not be doubted here; and that the Legislature possesses the same power, was to him clear, and for the same reason. Adverting to the provision of the Constitution, which privileged members of Congress from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and on going to and returning from the same; if the gentleman will tie us down to the letter of the Constitution, said Mr. H., how would he punish a man who should arrest a member contrary to this provision? Would he sue him at law? And where do you find in the Constitution anything by which you shall know how to proceed to punish him? Would not the gentleman do it in the way in which we are going on? And why? Because, said he, we possess the power to protect ourselves in the exercise of our duties. How would the gentleman proceed in the case of the arrest of himself and half a dozen of members, whose votes would turn the scale on a pending question of the highest moment? Discharge the members, and they might be arrested again, if there was no summary process against the offender. If there was no redress in such a case, but to turn the person offending over to suit or to indictment in the courts, the Constitutional provision was a mere illusion. But gentlemen themselves did not agree. One, said he, refers the House for redress of their complaint in the present case to the courts of justice; the other says that bribery is no offence, there being no law to punish it; of course the courts are not open to the complainant. So that, between them, Congress is in a strange predicament. We are, without remedy, at the mercy of every infamous man, who is disposed, either for the purpose of private malice or personal emolument, to play off his arts against the Representatives of the people. Mr. H. concluded by saying that he hoped the House would decide that it had the power, not only to protect its existence, but to preserve its character so pure and unsullied as to be exempted even from suspicion.

Mr. FORSYTH rose to correct an extraordinary mistake which the gentleman from New Hampshire had fallen into in regard to the precedent to which he had referred. That precedent was found in the Journal of the year 1795, before the division of parties, which has since existed, had taken place. It was not, therefore, a party question, but a great Constitutional point, which was then decided. On referring to the Journal for the final vote, it appeared that seventy-eight members had voted in the affirmative, and but seventeen against it. For another fact he was indebted to the information of a gentleman who was in a situation to have known it, that, of those seventy-eight, thirty-nine were subsequently on the Republican side of the question, and known as Republicans in the great parties into which the country soon after divided. Among these were some of the names most dear to the Republican party, and by this he meant no reflection on those who differed from them on that question. He need only refer to the names of Gallatin, Giles, Baldwin, Findley, and many others of the same grade—and were not these Republicans? They were; and each would bear a comparison with any man who had ever since called himself a Republican. They were the master spirits who headed the Republican party when it became one, and guided it in all its movements. But, Mr. F. said, he should be glad to find out how the gentleman discovered the great name of Jefferson to support him in his doctrine? That great man was not then a member of Congress; nor, Mr. F. said, did he know that he had expressed any opinion on the question. He did not find in the Manual composed by him any expression of an opinion that the Constitution had been violated by that decision. There was a statement of the arguments on both sides of that question; but so far from expressing the opinion that the Constitution had been violated, the Manual considered the question as unsettled. It was settled, then, on the ground that this body, and all others, corporate as well as individual, had the right to protect themselves from insult and violence. How, Mr. F. asked, would gentlemen proceed to punish an individual in the gallery of this House, who should consider it a great theatre, and exercise the privilege which insolent persons use in the gallery of a theatre, of disturbing the audience and annoying the performers? Suppose some person who was unfriendly to a member speaking, or who did not like the monotonous tone of his voice, should amuse himself by throwing nuts or apples at his head; by hissing on the one hand, or applauding on the other; by what authority would the House exercise the power of driving him away, or taking him into custody? Could any one doubt the power? But was it to be found, in so many words, in the Constitution? Gentlemen might say, this would be within our own walls, and therefore a different case from that now under consideration. Mr. F. regarded them as standing on the same footing; within and without, here or in any part of the city, if a member was insulted in the discharge of his duty, this House had, in his opinion, the right and the power to punish the of-sender. He hoped, at all events, the House would make the inquiry, and not stay its proceedings in this case, until something stronger had been alleged against them than anything he had heard.

Mr. PITKIN, of Connecticut, said he did not rise to debate the power of this House; for, he said, unless the House had some power to protect itself and its members in their persons and integrity, from violence or insult, they might as well adjourn and go home. But he rose to refer to one or two cases which had occurred subsequently to that which had been particularly referred to, to see how far the House had proceeded. A case had occurred, in 1810, of an assault and battery on a member of this House, not within the walls of the House, not during its sitting, and originating in circumstances having no relation to his duty as a member of the House; but, while here attending his public duty, that gentleman had been considered as under the protection of the authority of the House, and the House had accordingly taken cognizance of the assault; and justly—for, if the House had not power to protect its members while going and coming therefrom, it was in vain for them to attend here. In another case, a committee had been appointed to inquire into the promulgation of certain secret proceedings of the House. The individual promulgating them was brought to the bar of the House, and compelled to answer the questions propounded to him. If he had refused to answer the questions put to him, undoubtedly he would have been committed to prison for that contempt. Having no doubt of the power of the House in this respect, he hoped the House would act as proposed.

Mr. LIVERMORE again rose. He said he should suppose that no one had understood him to say that the Republicans were right or wrong, or that the Federalists were right or wrong, or to draw any distinction between the parties into which the country had been divided. He respected good men of all parties, and none other but good men of any party. He had said that an oath was necessary to support a warrant, and produced the Constitutional provision, "that no warrants shall issue, but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation." How am I answered? Why, that every member of this House is entitled to such high credit, that his word is as good as any other man's oath. The Chief Justice of the United States is sworn to support the Constitution, and to administer justice; but, he is not therefore sworn to everything, and his mere word would not be taken in this matter in controversy in any court. But, it seemed, that the rights of individuals were to be uprooted, and an express provision of the Constitution disregarded, on the word of a member, because he was sworn to support the Constitution. Mr. L. said he had as high an opinion of the credit to which members of this House were entitled, as any man could have, but he could not, in such a case as this, believe them, except on oath, considering himself bound to protect the rights of every individual in the United States, &c. The gentleman from Pennsylvania, Mr. L. continued, had found fault with some of his expressions. A man cannot take his words out of his mouth, look at them, put them in again, and speak as he could wish; and Mr. L. said he might have gone further than he intended.—Whether those who established the precedent of 1795 were Republicans, or be they whom they might, they had acted on precedents drawn from the British Parliament, a body whose powers in this respect were not analogous to those of the Congress of the United States. The Parliament of Great Britain is a perpetual convention, of which every law and practice becomes a part of the constitution. But we are a limited Legislature, and the Constitution controls us. And when such a question as this is presented, how shall we get over it? Mr. L. disclaimed any intention to accuse those who established the precedent in the case of Whitney and Randall, of having acted wrongly, against conviction. God forbid he should have said so; but, if he had been a little warm on the subject when up before, perhaps the gentleman from Pennsylvania, (whom no man respected more than he,) had warned himself as well as the gentleman from New Hampshire. Let that gentleman, however, reconcile the proceeding of Congress to that provision which he had referred to. It was no way to put a man down to say, that one man's word is as good as another man's oath. It was saying what the Constitution had not left the House at liberty to say. But, it was asked, could Congress do nothing to protect themselves? Must they be trampled on, and spit upon, without remedy? Mr. L. said he had admitted before, and he now repeated, that the Sergeant-at-Arms, within the House, might command the whole force of the country, the Army and Militia, and, supposing such a case possible, might bring a seventy-four up the Eastern Branch to fire upon the Capitol; but the House had not the extensive power for which gentlemen now contended. Suppose he were to rise and say, that, as he was coming here, the Governor or Chief Justice of New Hampshire had offered him a bribe; would this House send out its warrant and bring him here? Would this be Constitutional? He hoped not. If the procedure would not be warrantable as to such men, neither would it to the meanest man in the State, for no man there was a slave; and Mr. L. would not stretch the power of the Government to oppress the meanest or the greatest. As to the suggestion of the gentleman from Virginia, to pass a law on this subject, Mr. L. highly approved it. Let us, according to the system of Mr. Jefferson, hang up rules for the inspection of all, which may direct the conduct of the citizen, and, if they are broken, punish the offender. But, with such views, would the gentleman punish poor Anderson, because he sinned against a law before the law was made? Mr. L. did not like such doctrine. He concluded by saying that, though what he had said might be thrown away, he had thought it his duty to offer it. He might have been warm, he said, but it was time to be warm when a man could no longer keep himself cool.

Mr. SERGEANT, of Pennsylvania, said, as the motion now before the House, was merely for the appointment of a committee of inquiry, he could see no reasonable objection to it. The matter proposed to be inquired into was not, he said, a question merely between the individual accused and the House; but it was one in which the nation was interested; and the House would commit as great an error if they neglected to inflict a proper punishment on the offender in such a case, as if they were to inflict punishment where no offence had been committed. The immediate question was not, whether the members of the House were assailable by bribes; whether their feelings were to be wounded with impunity; whether they were liable to the arts of seduction; but it was a general question whether the House would or would not inquire what authority it had to punish those offending in this respect. If we have the authority, said Mr. S., we are bound to inflict punishment in the case before us; for if the offence supposed to have been committed shall be proved, can any case occur hereafter more requiring the exercise of the powers of this House? If you will not exercise what power you possess now, there is no species of attempt which may not be made with impunity on the honor or on the feelings of this House; there is no practice, however corrupt, which may not be attempted. For upon whom was this attempt made? Upon a member who is at the head of the Committee of Claims, that committee whose business it is to determine between the claims of individuals and the interest of the United States, coming in conflict before them; in doing which the chairman of that committee has to contend, on the part of the United States, against the interest, urged in every possible shape, of the individuals whose claims are preferred to this House. And would the House allow the member who occupies that station of sentinel at the door of the Treasury, to be placed in a situation to be exposed to all the gross and corrupt attempts which may be made on him, if they are permitted to be made with impunity? Surely not. If, then, Mr. S. repeated, the House would not, in the present case, exercise the power of punishing for contempt, there never would occur one in which it would.

As to the question immediately before the House, Mr. S. said, a reference to a committee was the usual course in all matters coming before the House. Why not then pursue the usual course in a matter of as much importance as this? It appeared to him, indeed, that course was inevitable; the House had gone so far in its proceedings that it was impossible to stop at this stage, unless it could be shown more clearly than it had been, that the warrant which had issued was altogether without authority.

There were, Mr. S. said, in the present, as there must be in all similar cases, two offences committed; the one, a crime for which the individual might be handed over to the courts of justice for the punishment; the other an offence against this House, for which the individual might be proceeded against and punished in a summary manner. He did not say that both these courses might not be pursued. But he did admit that the question whether the House should or should not interfere, was at all times a question on which a sound discretion must be exercised when the case arises. In this way he would answer the gentleman from New Hampshire, who had supposed extreme cases. This House, said Mr. S., may certainly in such cases rely on its own discretion, that it will not be impelled into a course which is unjust. The case now before the House was not such a case, however, but one of a totally different character. If the House proceeded no further now, the privileges of the House were surrendered in every case, unless for what should be done in the face of the House. If the doctrine of the gentlemen from Ohio and New Hampshire prevail, said Mr. S., we shall be assailable at our door, on the staircase, everywhere until we come into this House, and this House is organized. Was this possible? And yet, he said, he did not suppose cases as extreme as those put on the other side.

As to the omnipotence of the British Parliament, to which was imputed their extensive privileges, Mr. S. said that Parliament consisted of two branches, the Lords and the Commons, exercising legislative authority. But the authority exercised by those bodies in the punishment of contempts, and in the protection of their privileges, was not a legislative act; not an act of Parliament at all, but of the individual houses. The House would see at once the distinction between the exercise of the legislative authority, and of the right and power of self-protection; and the gentleman from New Hampshire would see that his remarks on the omnipotence of the British Parliament afforded no argument against the exercise of power in regard to the privileges of this House, somewhat analogous to those of the British House of Commons. Neither was it correct, Mr. S. said, that the Houses of Parliament, in respect to privileges, were omnipotent. Gentlemen might recollect a case which had occurred during the trial of Warren Hastings, when a clergyman by the name of Logan, thinking Hastings unjustly dealt by, entered into an acrimonious vindication of him against the charges preferred by the House of Commons. That House did not in that case proceed with a summary process, but directed a prosecution to be commenced against the publisher; and that case had since become famous by the name of the prosecution against Stockdale.

Mr. S. said, he was free to confess that with respect to many of those distant attacks upon the House in public prints, or otherwise, which appeared to touch the House and yet scarcely reached it, he should say, leave them to the ordinary administration of justice; but when the hands of corruption were extended to this House, he hoped the Constitution would never fail the House in exercising an authority at once, because it was an offence which punishment ought to follow, and to follow speedily. For, said he, if practices of this kind are indulged; if members of this House, exposed to such attempts, are to be left individually to follow the persons to punishment, we may calculate on the indisposition of the member to remain here to prosecute to conviction, and there are so many chances of escape that there is reason to apprehend there will occur many instances of this character—not quite so strong, I trust—but of minor grades, which the chance of impunity will encourage.

Mr. S. concluded by saying that he held it to be the solemn duty of the House, if they have the authority under the Constitution, not to flinch from the exercise of it; because the exercise of it was of high importance not to this House only, but to the people of the United States, whose dearest interests are concerned in it.

Mr. BALL, of Virginia said, if this proposition to appoint a committee had been made in the first instance, he should have had no objection to the proposed inquiry. But he was under the impression that this inquiry into their power ought to have been had before the warrant was issued. Suppose this person had been in a distant part of this country, in the District of Maine, for example: would this House arrest him, bring him here, and then inquire whether they had power to do so or not? Would not this be a grievance of the highest character against the laws of the land, and against the Constitution itself? Supposing, after putting a person, accused of contempt, to all this inconvenience, and holding him in durance, it should appear that he was not amenable to the authority of this House; would not this proceeding have been manifestly wrong, and an oppression of the citizen? Had we not better, said Mr. B., suffer a thousand insults, than trample on the personal liberty of the citizen? The liberty of the citizen was guarded by the express provisions of the Constitution; and he would not, he said, exercise any authority restraining it, unless unsupported by the Constitution. That was his guide; he had taken an oath to support it, and that instrument provided that no warrant shall issue, unless supported by oath. The warrant against John Anderson had, therefore, issued in contradiction to the Constitution. The proper course would be to discharge him from the warrant which had been illegally issued; to investigate the subject; and, if it should be decided that he was amenable to the House, then to arrest him and punish him, but not, otherwise, to proceed further in the business.

Mr. HUBBARD, of New York, rose to suggest, that, reasoning from the context, the provision of the Constitution which had been quoted, referred only to courts of justice, and could not be construed to apply to warrants of the description now under consideration.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, said he had no objection to vote for the resolution, if it contemplated merely an inquiry into the proper mode of proceeding. Whilst, on the one hand, he said, he was at all times ready and willing to support the Constitutional rights and privileges of the House, and was willing, with that view, to go on with the inquiry, he was, on the other hand, bound to protect the citizen from the arbitrary exercise of discretion on the part of the House. Wherever there was guilt, he hoped there would be no shrinking from investigation. When it was proposed to bring to the bar that individual now accused, whom he had known as a hardy warrior in his country's service, with the frosts of many winters on his head (not that he would say anything to justify the late conduct of that individual,) Mr. J. said, he had not shrunk from the authority of the House. Mr. J. was opposed to this resolution if it was intended to examine the accused before a committee; he was opposed to any course of proceeding but bringing the individual before the House: he wished to see his face; he wished to hear the testimony of those who had known him from his infancy, as to his general character. On this occasion, Mr. J. said, he felt himself to stand in the character of a judge: to examine and punish the accused according to his guilt, but on the other hand to protect his rights whilst arraigned before this House without law to protect him. It was due to the House and to the individual, that he should be brought before them, that circumstances of aggravation or mitigation should be adduced; and if he was found guilty, with corrupt intention, of offering a bribe to a member of this House—whose character, said Mr. J., stands on a basis needing no encomium from me—if the man should have been so far depraved as to commit this outrage, under no circumstances of mitigation, Mr. J. said he would go, as far as the Constitution would justify him, to punish him. This was no longer a personal question; the member who had so honorably brought forward this charge was no longer an insulted individual, any more than he (Mr. J.) It was the House that was insulted; it was for it to punish the offender, if it had the power.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said he did not suppose it possible for any gentleman to misunderstand the object of the motion before the House; which was, not to examine John Anderson, but to inquire what further steps it would be proper to pursue in the case.

Mr. JOHNSON said he had no sort of objection to the resolution.

Mr. BALL rose to say, in reply to the suggestion of the gentleman from New York, that he had not referred to the clause of the Constitution which he had quoted, without having first determined, in his own mind, the true construction of it. The gentleman said that the provision in question referred only to judicial proceedings. Is not this, Mr. B. asked, a judicial proceeding? Will any gentleman contend we can legislate a man into prison? If we are to punish him, it is from a judicial power inherent in this body. If, in punishing him, we act in a judicial capacity, (which will not be denied,) an oath is necessary to justify a warrant for his apprehension.

JANUARY, 1818.

Case of Colonel Anderson.

H. OF R.

Mr. TERRY said that, on this occasion, it appeared to him, to use a vulgar adage, gentlemen leapt before they came to the stile. With respect to the Constitutional provision for the protection of individuals, if a warrant contrary to law was before a court of justice, where strict law prevails, the court would not ex officio quash it, if the party concerned submitted to it. It was proper, Mr. T. said, that Colonel Anderson should have the opportunity of objecting to it. If he did so, Mr. T. reserved to himself the right to decide whether the warrant had been issued constitutionally or not. In the present state of the proceedings, he said, the House ought not to decide: if conscious of his offence, the individual might not think it advisable to object to the authority of the House.

Mr. BEECHER, of Ohio, again addressed the Chair. A man, he said, is either free, or he is not. If free, he was entitled to exemption from every species of arrest not authorized by law. I contend, said Mr. B., that it is our duty, if we find we have proceeded wrongly, to correct the procedure as soon as possible. Where will this end? When will you put a stop to it? He denied the discretionary power of the House to punish at pleasure, according to the doctrine of the gentlemen from Pennsylvania. It was time to examine rigorously what was the power of this House in that respect: for, he believed, according to the Constitution of the country, no man could be punished on the supposition that he had committed a crime, but on the ground that he had infringed some law. The Constitution provides that no ex post facto law shall be passed; that no citizen shall be deprived of life, liberty or property without due process of law; and that no person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime without presentment or indictment by a grand jury. Is this man, or is he not, said Mr. B., deprived of his liberty without due process of law? Is he accused of a crime? If so, where is the law defining it? Or, have we the privilege of making anything criminal which we may choose to call a crime. How will you punish the person whom you decide to be guilty of a crime your own will has constituted? By imprisonment at discretion? That, said Mr. B., is a power I do not wish to possess. Again, he said, the Constitution required that the trial of all criminal prosecutions should be by jury. Was this a trial by jury? If this man has trespassed on his neighbor's rights, Mr. B. said, the courts are open for redress. The individual now in custody is accused of an offence for which there is no punishment; but, it is contended, that in the exercise of our discretion, we may inflict it to any extent we think fit. It was a doctrine maintained by the courts of our country, that no man should be punished for an act which he did not know was a crime when he was committing it. But, it was contended, that there was a power inherent in this body to take such measures as will protect its own integrity. Our integrity, Mr. B. said, is to be protected by other means than those which may be adopted by this House to prevent individuals from assailing it. How far, he asked, does the jurisdiction of this House extend, on the principles for which gentlemen contend? All over the United States? Or is it circumscribed, and by what limits? A bribe might be offered to a member before he came here; if the member discloses it after his arrival, have we a right to send for the offender? Mr. B. said he could not accede to this doctrine.

But it was said that this resolution provided a way in which a thorough investigation of the subject might be had; and therefore it ought not to be objected to. Mr. B. objected to it, because, he said, it was the duty of every man, here and elsewhere, to protect the rights of the citizen, of the invasion of which there was more danger than that the rights of this House would be trampled under foot, and the nation thereby sustain injury. If, said he, we are to be organized as the grand inquest of the nation, invested with discretionary power, we are possessed of a power dangerous in the extreme. Let us not now, said he, establish a principle and doctrine that in time may be productive of everything iniquitous and injurious. To what extent might not this doctrine lead? If for what is said or done out of doors, citizens may be required to answer at our bar, every man in the nation is liable to be arraigned at our will and pleasure, although in conscientiously opposing and reprobating our measures he has exercised no more than his Constitutional right, &c.

If solitary precedents might be found on the Journals of the exercise of such a power by the House, it was time now to put a stop to it. It was time now to stop, and inquire whether the House is possessed of power to enable it to bring before it at pleasure whomsoever it chooses to arraign for a supposed breach of supposed privileges. That, Mr. B. said, was the question he wished to have put, and which he wished the House seriously to decide. ✓

Mr. COMSTOCK, of New York, said he did not rise to detain the House, but to say that he thought, unless this or a similar resolution passed, (for appointing a committee) the patience of the House would be put to a severer test than it had yet been, by the protraction of a debate arising from the want of a definite proposition before the House, which it would be the business of a committee to present. Many observations, it appeared to Mr. C., had escaped gentlemen in the course of the debate that had already taken place, which might have been offered with more propriety when this man should be brought before the House, and exhibit the evidence, if he has any, to extenuate his guilt. It would then be more proper that it was now to comment on his character and on all the circumstances of the transaction. At present, Mr. C. said, he would forbear any remarks on that head; he thought that enough had been disclosed to justify what had been already done.

The resolution was finally agreed to, and Messrs. FORSYTH, HOPKINSON, TUCKER, SER-GEANT, JOHNSON, of Kentucky, PITKIN, and TAYLOR, were appointed a committee accordingly.

The House then proceeded to other business, though the case of Colonel Anderson was subsequently resumed, as will be seen.

The engrossed bill, making a further appropriation (of $200,000) for repairing the public buildings, was read a third time, and passed.

JUDICIAL RECORDS, &c.

The House then spent some time in Committee of the Whole, on the bill to prescribe the effect of certain records and judicial proceedings.

The question being still on striking out the second section of the bill, which was opposed by Mr. H. NELSON and advocated by Mr. BARBOUR:

Mr. SPENCER had risen to defend the section, when information having been given that the committee on the case of Colonel John Anderson were ready to report,

The Committee of the Whole rose, reported progress, and obtained leave to sit again.

COLONEL ANDERSON'S CASE.

Mr. FORSYTH, from the committee appointed to-day, made a report recommending that the House do come to the following resolution:

Resolved, That John Anderson be brought to the bar of the House, and interrogated by the Speaker, on written interrogatories, touching the charge of writing and delivering a letter to a member of the House, offering him a bribe, which, with his answers thereto, shall be entered on the minutes of the House. And that every question proposed by a member be reduced to writing, and a motion made that the same be put by the Speaker, and the question and answer shall be entered on the minutes of the House. That, after such interrogatories are answered, if the House deem it necessary to make further inquiry on the subject, the same be conducted by a committee to be appointed for that purpose.

Mr. BEECHER made a motion to refer the report to a Committee of the Whole House.—Negatived.

Mr. BEECHER declared this resolution to propose, in his opinion, a novel procedure. The man was to be brought to the bar to be interrogated; for what? To criminate himself? If he speaks the truth, he must criminate himself. Was this House, Mr. B. asked, to be converted into an inquisitorial court? For such proceedings were proposed, adverse to the right of the accused, as were in other courts sedulously avoided, and as were contrary to the principle of the Constitution, that no person shall be compelled, in any criminal case, to be witness against himself. Mr. B. protested against this proceeding, which, he said, ought not to be adopted.

The report was agreed to without a division.

Mr. BEECHER moved that counsel be allowed to the accused.

Mr. SERGEANT suggested that it would be time enough to do that when the prisoner asked for it.

Mr. BEECHER said it was the right of this individual, placed in so novel a situation, to have his privilege pointed out to him, which otherwise he might not know.

Mr. TUCKER read a resolution that the Speaker be authorized to inform the accused that he might ask counsel, &c.

Which was superseded by an intimation from the Speaker, that he should consider it a duty, if no objection was made, to give the accused information on this head.

The Sergeant-at-Arms was then directed to bring his prisoner to the bar of the House.

On his appearance, the SPEAKER directed a chair to be given to him, and addressed him to this effect:

"John Anderson, you are no doubt aware that you are brought before this House in consequence of having written and delivered to a gentleman, who is a member and chairman of a committee of this House, a letter, of the contents of which you are apprized. Before I proceed to propound to you any interrogatories on this subject, I will apprise you that, if you have any request to make of the House; if you wish for counsel, for reasonable time, for witnesses, for any of those privileges belonging to persons in similar situations, the House is disposed to grant it. If you do not wish for time, for counsel, or for witnesses, the Speaker will proceed to put to you such interrogatories as may seem proper."

To this the prisoner at the bar replied, in substance, although indistinctly, that, in his peculiar situation, he desired the assistance of counsel; he desired time until to-morrow, and the opportunity of summoning witnesses to testify to the character he had sustained through life.

Whereupon the Sergeant-at-Arms was directed to take the prisoner from the bar.

Some conversation took place as to the precise mode of proceeding, which resulted in drawing up a resolution that the Speaker be authorized to inform the accused that the House comply with his requests.

Mr. HERRICK moved to amend the motion, so as that the accused be furnished previously with a copy of the written interrogatories to be put to him.

To this Mr. FORSYTH objected, because it would be inconsistent with the object of this examination. The object was to ascertain whether the accused admitted or denied the offence imputed to him. If he denied it, it would be for the House to substantiate it; if he admitted it, it was for the House to proportion its decision thereon to the magnitude of the offence.

Mr. HERRICK withdrew his first motion, and moved that the accused be furnished with a copy of the letter which was the ground of this proceeding; to which was added, on suggestion of Mr. RICH, a copy of the statement of Mr. WILLIAMS accompanying the letter.

Thus amended, the resolution according these privileges to the accused, was agreed to.

The prisoner having been remanded to the bar of the House, the SPEAKER addressed him nearly as follows:

"John Anderson, I am directed to inform you that, pursuant to your request, you are at liberty to engage such counsel as you may think fit; that the Clerk of the House will furnish you with such subpoenas for witnesses as you may think proper, and that you will also be furnished with a copy of the letter on which the proceedings are founded, and of the statement of an honorable member of this House which accompanied it. I am further directed to inform you that to-morrow at one o'clock is the time assigned for further proceedings in this case."

And then the Sergeant-at-Arms withdrew from the bar with his prisoner.

The House adjourned at a late hour.

FRIDAY, January 9.

Another member, to wit: from Rhode Island, JAMES B. MASON, appeared, produced his credentials, was qualified, and took his seat.

Mr. JOHNSON, of Kentucky, from the committee of investigation on so much of the public accounts and expenditures as relate to the War Department, made a report respecting a certain contract entered into with the Government by Col. Elias Earle, on the 3d of February 1815, while a member of the House of Representatives, explaining the nature of the transaction, and exonerating Colonel E. from any blame under the circumstances of the case; which report, together with one of the last session on the same subject, was ordered to be printed.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, from the Committee on the Public Lands, to whom was committed the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Samuel Aikman," reported the agreement of the committee to the same; which were concurred in by the House.

Mr. ROBERTSON also reported the agreement of the committee, to the amendments proposed by the Senate to the bill, entitled "An act for the relief of Joel Earwood," with an amendment; which was read and concurred in by the House.

A message from the Senate informed the House that the Senate have passed the resolution from this House, "directing the procurement of certain laws," with an amendment, in which they ask the concurrence of this House.

ORGANIZATION OF THE MILITIA.

Mr. HARRISON from the Committee appointed on that part of the President's Message which relates to the militia, made a report; which was read; when Mr. H. reported a bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; for calling them into the service of the United States; for governing them therein; and for compensating them for their services; which was read twice and committed to a Committee of the Whole. The report is as follows:

The committee to whom was referred so much of the Message of the President as relates to the militia have had that subject under consideration, and beg leave to report, that the Constitution grants to Congress the following powers in relation to the militia, to wit: To provide for organizing the militia; for arming them; for disciplining them; for calling them into the service of the United States; for governing them therein; and for compensating them for their services; which powers the committee have considered separately.

1. The committee are of opinion, that, in organizing the militia, it would be a great improvement to divide them into two classes, with a view to train diligently, and to provide to arm immediately, the young men, and exempt the elderly men from the sacrifice of time which effective training would require—the organization of the militia might remain in all other respects nearly as heretofore established.

2. The Constitution having made it the duty of Congress to provide for arming the militia, this power is not duly exercised by merely enacting that the militia shall arm themselves. A law to that effect, unsanctioned by penalties, will be disregarded, and, if thus sanctioned, will be unjust, for it will operate as a capitation tax, which the opulent and the needy will pay equally, and which will not be borne by the States in the proportion fixed by the Constitution. The committee do not approve of putting public arms into the hands of the militia when not necessary. That mode would expose the arms to be lost and destroyed. They conceive that Congress should provide arsenals, from which the militia of every part of the United States could draw arms when necessary, which would be a sufficient exercise of the power to provide for arming the militia.

3. Congress having power to provide for governing the militia only when they are in the service of the United States, and the authority of training them belonging to the State governments, the committee have not deemed it proper that Congress should prescribe the time to be devoted to training, or the manner in which that object will be best effected. It is the duty of the State Legislatures to enact the necessary laws for that purpose. The committee deem it a sufficient exercise of the power to provide for disciplining the militia, to direct the appointment of the necessary officers, to prescribe their duties, and to provide a system of discipline, comprehending the camp duties instruction, field exercise, and field service of the militia.

4. The committee are of opinion, that the regulations for calling forth the militia may remain substantially as at present existing. That the President should, in all cases, address his orders immediately to some officer of the militia, and not to the Executive of any State. The Governor of a State is not a militia officer, bound to execute the orders of the President; he cannot be tried for disobedience of orders, and punished by the sentence of a court martial.

5. In providing for governing the militia in the service of the United States, it has appeared to your committee that the senior class might be exempted from being marched out of the State to which they may belong; that the junior class, composed of ardent and vigorous men, the efficient force of the nation, should, when called into service, continue therein some time after having acquired the knowledge and habits of soldiers; that the officers should, by their own consent, be continued still longer in service, as military knowledge, principles, and habits, are most essential to the officers, who are the soul of an army. It has also appeared to your committee, that those principles would be best acquired by the officers of the militia, in serving with officers of the regular troops on courts martial, for the trial of offenders either of the regular troops or militia.

6. The compensation to the militia for their services, consisting of pay and allowance for clothing, and of pensions in case of disability by wounds received in the service, the committee would allow to remain nearly as heretofore fixed by law.

The committee, acting according to the foregoing principles, report a bill to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia; for calling them into the service of the United States; for governing them therein; and for compensating them for their services.

AMENDMENT TO THE CONSTITUTION.

Mr. HARRISON submitted the following proposition of amendment to the Constitution of the United States; which was read and committed to the Committee of the Whole, to which is committed the bill this day reported, for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia, &c.

Resolved, by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America, in Congress assembled, two-thirds of both Houses concurring therein, That the following amendment to the Constitution of the United States, be proposed to the Legislatures of the several States; which, when ratified by the Legislatures of three-fourths of said States, shall be valid to all intents and purposes as a part of the said Constitution:

Congress shall, concurrently with the States, have power to provide for training the militia, according to the discipline prescribed for that purpose, and whilst engaged in that service, they shall be subject to the rules and regulations prescribed for the government of the militia, when in the military service of the United States; and also, to provide for teaching, in the primary schools and other seminaries of learning in the several States, the system of discipline prescribed for the militia.

[In offering his resolution, Mr. HARRISON remarked, that it would be recollected he presumed, that a similar proposition had been laid on the table by him at the last session. In doing so then it was not with an expectation that anything would be done on the subject at that time, but it was to draw the public attention to the subject, and prepare the way for a decision at the present session. The bill which had been reported on the subject embraced all the provisions within the power of Congress respecting it which the committee had thought necessary; but as the Constitution had expressly reserved to the States the right of training and disciplining the militia, the adoption of the resolution might be deemed necessary; and he wished therefore that it might be committed to the same committee to whom the bill had been referred, that the whole subject might thus be presented to it for deliberation, &c.]

CASE OF COLONEL ANDERSON.

Mr. SPENCER offered for consideration the following preamble and resolutions:

The House of Representatives, entertaining great doubts of its possessing the competent power to punish John Anderson for his contempt of the House, and his outrage upon one of its members:

Resolved, That all further proceedings in this House against the said John Anderson, do cease, and that he be discharged from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Resolved, That the Attorney General of the United States be directed to institute such proceedings against the said John Anderson for his said offence as may be agreeable to the laws of the United States and of the District of Columbia.

Resolved, That the Committee on the Judiciary be instructed to inquire into the expediency of providing by law for the punishment of any contempt of the Senate or House of Representatives of the United States, and of any breach of the privileges of either House.

Mr. SPENCER, of New York, observed, that in submitting the resolutions which had been read, his object was to procure a decision of the House on the abstract question of its right to proceed in the case of Colonel Anderson. He had offered them in this stage of the proceedings, because no opportunity had yet been given to take the sense of the House, and with a view also of preventing the influence of those feelings, which the demerits of the case might excite, in producing a decision that calm and deliberate reason might not sanction. It was more consistent, also, with the dignity of the House, that we should retrace its proceedings, if they were wrong, from our own impulse, rather than be compelled to do so on the motion of the accused or his counsel.

Mr. S. unequivocally condemned the conduct of the accused; and his indignation at the enormity of the offence had, he confessed, carried him too far in endeavoring to punish it. The only apology I have to offer, said Mr. S. is to be found in that universal burst of feeling which spread through the House on the disclosure of the base transaction. But time for reflection has succeeded to the impetuosity of feeling; and, being perfectly convinced that we were wrong, I take the first opportunity to acknowledge my error, and to expiate it, by submitting the resolutions on your table.

In deciding this question, we act as judges, and we must demand the very letter of the law to authorize our decision. With the propriety, or expediency, or necessity of having some law on the subject, we, as judges, have nothing to do. We act not as legislators, but in a judicial capacity, in a cause between us and the accused; and we are as strictly bound by the law of the land as any court of justice can be. Let us, then, search for that law. If it is to be found at all, it is either in the Constitution, in the laws of the United States, or in the law of Parliament. The friends of the procedure have been in vain called upon to point out the express power given by the Constitution. So far from doing so, they have not, as yet, answered the objections which the Constitution itself interposes. The 4th article of the amendments provides, "that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by oath or affirmation," and that it shall describe the person to be seized. In the present case, a warrant has been issued, directing a person to be seized, without being supported by oath or affirmation. But we have been told, that the clause is only intended to regulate courts of justice. There is no such limitation in the amendment; but, admit it, and what is gained? The issuing of process to bring in a party to answer is in itself a judicial act; all our proceedings in the case are founded upon the idea of our being a court for this purpose. By the 5th amendment it is provided that no person shall be held to answer for an infamous crime unless on indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in service. If any doubt should exist as to the universality of the prohibition, the excepted cases which it mentions shows conclusively that it was intended to apply to all others. Here there is no presentment, and no one will contend that it is one of the excepted cases. The same amendment provides that no person shall be compelled to be a witness against himself in a criminal case. We are about to propound interrogatories to this man; if he refuse to answer them, what are you next to do? Will you treat the refusal as another contempt, and punish him for it; and thus compel him to bear witness against himself? Or will you persist in making a vain effort at power, when you know you must retire discomfited and disgraced? The 6th amendment provides for the trial by jury. In no sense of the word can this House be deemed a jury; we are not returned by an Executive officer; we possess not the qualifications of jurors, and the right of challenge of course could not be allowed.

From this examination, it results, then, that if we proceed against this man for a crime, as some have contended, our measures are wholly unconstitutional, illegal, and void. If we proceed against him at all, it must be for a contempt amounting to a breach of the privileges of the House. The most diligent research has not enabled me to discover either the word or the idea of a contempt as applied to Congress, in either the Constitution or laws of the United States, and I venture to affirm that neither of them is to be found there.

But it is said the House, from necessity, must have the power of punishing contempts, and that without it we should be unable to legislate. I deny, as broadly and as generally as the assertion is made, the existence of any such necessity. It is sufficient for your purposes, to exercise the natural right which every citizen possesses, in his self-defence, of removing any interruptions in the discharge of your duties. It is strictly on the right of self-defence, and while it will authorize you to remove any cause of interruption in your business, and to prevent the offender from entering your galleries, it will not justify you in going a single step further. The necessity does not require that you should punish the offender; it does not require that you should pursue him beyond your own mansion. Your deliberations are unaffected by his punishment. And I cannot conceive how it can be deemed necessary to our employments here to take any notice whatever of an offence which does not interrupt our debates nor retard our business. Is it contended that the power to punish for contempts is inherent in the House? If there be any meaning in the term, it must be that without the power you cannot act as legislators; that is, that it is essential. There can be no other inherent rights than those which are absolutely necessary. And, then, it results in the same question of necessity which has been already discussed.

A gentleman from Virginia yesterday alluded to that part of the Constitution giving to Congress the powers necessary to carry into execution those which were specially granted. I cannot for a moment imagine that that gentleman intended to quote that clause as giving to this House executive and judicial powers. But to prevent misapprehension, permit me to quote it; it is this: "that Congress may make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers." Not that this House may exercise these powers, but that this Congress, composed of the three branches of the Government, may make laws to execute the incidental powers. It does not even authorize this House to make the law, much less to usurp the judicial authority in deciding on it, or the executive in enforcing it. Between us and those powers the Constitution has erected an insurmountable barrier. In this case, there being no law, we, as a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, have no right to make it. If then it be true, that it is both necessary and proper, for carrying into execution the powers vested in Congress, that contempts of either House not amounting to an actual interruption of business, shall be punished, here is your authority for passing a law to define the crime and to prescribe the punishment. And I do, in the utmost extent, admit that Congress have the incidental power of passing all laws necessary and proper to attain the objects contemplated by the Constitution. Indeed, it is a principle as dear to me as any other in our Government; a principle so strengthened, confirmed, and rooted in my mind, that intellect and understanding must go with it when I yield. But until a law is passed, there can be no crime, for crime consists in the violation of a law; and there can be no punishment, for that is the judgment of law, not of a court, upon the crime. The argument reported by Mr. Jefferson to have been used in the Senate of the United States, in the case of the editor of the Aurora, is so applicable to this part of the subject, that I must beg the indulgence of the House for quoting it: "In requiring a previous law, the Constitution had regard to the inviolability of the citizen as well as of the member; as should one House, in the regular form of a bill, aim at too broad privileges, it may be checked by the other, and both by the President. And also, as the law being promulgated, the citizen will know how to avoid offence. But if one branch may assume its own privileges without control, if it may do it on the spur of the occasion, conceal the law in its own breast, and, after the fact committed, make its sentence both the law and judgment on that fact; if the offence is to be kept undefined, and to be declared only ex re nata, [as the case arises] and according to the passions of the moment, and there be limitation either in the manner or the measure of the punishment, the condition of the citizen will be perilous indeed!" Perilous, sir! it will be the condition a slave, dependent upon the arbitrary will of another. And is not the very proposition to exercise such a tremendous power, and under such circumstances, enough to appal us? Here are we assembled as accusers, witnesses, jurors, and judges; the offended party, acting in all these capacities, and burning with indignation at a flagrant outrage; and we are called upon to make the law, to decide upon it, and to punish in our own case!—to decide what? whether an offence has been committed against an unknown law;—to punish how? according to the dictates of our own feelings! As one, sir, I dare not trust myself with such powers; and sure I am that no body of men under Heaven shall ever, with my consent, exercise them against me. Your power over your own members is defined; I know its extent; but the authority now claimed has no other limits than those of passion, and no other restraints than those of pride.

An argument is attempted to be drawn from the fact, that the courts and Legislatures of the different States, and of England, exercise the power claimed. With regard to the law of Parliament, in England, it is a peculiar branch of the common law, declared by the two Houses from time to time. That law is not recognised in the United States Government or its courts, except so far as it has been expressly adopted. Repeated decisions of the courts have put that question at rest. I utterly disclaim and deny, therefore, the authority of the law of Parliament as applicable to Congress. We reject some of the forms of that body, and adopt others; but I trust we have not admitted, and never will admit into our institutions, the despotic principles which have too often disgraced its proceedings, especially in cases of privilege.

With respect to the different States, the common law, with special exceptions, has been either expressly or impliedly adopted, or its principles have been enacted in statutes, and that law has conferred upon the State courts and Legislatures the power of punishing for contempts. The practice of the States, therefore, furnishes no example for us. The authority claimed is not given by our Constitution or laws; and it cannot be derived from the common law, because we do not recognise the law itself. Besides, the State Legislatures possess other and very different powers from those belonging to Congress. Our authority is limited by certain fixed and definite land-marks; their powers are plenary and ample; they possess all that are not delegated to us. We are a branch of a limited Government for certain precise and special purposes; they are Governments for all other purposes, without any limitation of power other than that prescribed by their own constitutions. The cases, therefore, are not analogous, and from their practice we can derive no sanction.

The authority of the courts of the States to punish for contempts, is upon the same foundation. They have acquired it by the adoption of the common law, or by express statutes. The courts of the United States maintain the same power by virtue of a law of Congress. The first Congress which assembled under the Constitution, composed of the framers of that instrument, have given their construction of it in the law which they passed in September, 1789; by which authority is given to all the courts of the United States "to punish, by fine or imprisonment, all contempts of authority in any cause or hearing before the same." If all courts possess the inherent power contended for, then did that venerable body, to whose labors we so frequently appeal, commit the solecism of granting that which was already possessed. Far from it, sir. They knew that they were originating an entirely new system, and they intended that it should emanate from their hands complete, and as perfect as they could make it. It was an experiment—it was entirely new; nothing like it had existed—it began above. Intending to limit it, it became as necessary to give sufficient powers for the execution of the contemplated purposes, as it was to prohibit the assumption of those which were not granted. Such was the course pursued, and our Government, like our courts, possesses no powers but those contained in the compact which spoke it into existence.

I have done, sir, with the plea of necessity—the tyrant's plea, which is always used when there is no other to justify harsh and rigorous measures, or exorbitant powers. The next argument which I have to meet is that of precedent; the eternal refuge and expedient of a cause that shrinks from inspection, and would hide itself in the obscurity of example. But, fortunately for our country, the examples of the exercise of this power are so few, that there is little danger that the case of Anderson will be mingled with the common rubbish of precedent. It will be regarded, because it occurred in a season of profound political tranquillity, when there were no party passions to stimulate our animosities or influence our decisions; and yet this very case, occurring at such a period, ought to induce us to distrust the precedent of all others. When an atrocious insult was offered to one of the most respectable members of this House, a gentleman who bears the very impress of integrity, and whom none but the most weak or the most profligate could think of approaching improperly, after viewing those lines which the Almighty has written on his countenance; when such an insult was offered to such a man, and that man our fellow-member; when such an indignity was offered to this House, who could stop to inquire whether the first weapon he seized to smite the offender, was or was not strictly lawful? I confess that as one I took the weapon offered in the warrant for apprehending Anderson, without thinking of the consequences of its use, and without caring for them. For this rashness I have atoned as far as I was able; and it has taught me a lesson which I am now improving—to distrust those precedents which I fear have been established under the operation of similar feelings.

But, sir, I have a general objection to precedents in legislation, not to forms; they are essential to the despatch of business and to accuracy.

JANUARY, 1818.

Case of Colonel Anderson.

H. OF R.

But I do object to any two or three cases furnishing a rule for decision. For what purpose is a new Congress assembled every two years, if it is to be bound by the determination of its predecessors? From the very nature of legislation there can be no precedent. Each Congress is supreme, and each law must be passed upon its own merits. You may, indeed, refer to the proceedings of a former Congress, as expressing the opinions of gentlemen entitled to great weight, but surely you are not bound by them. Hence arises the difference between the effect of precedents in a court of justice and in a Legislature. In the former some fixed rule is necessary, that suitors may know their rights; in the latter, when it is not a question of right, each case furnishes its own rule.

In the particular case of contempts, there is the same objection to our being bound by precedents; and that is derived from the circumstance that, there having been no law defining the crime, and prescribing its punishment, each case must, in common charity, be supposed to have been determined upon its own merits. Had there been a law the crime would have been known, and the precise turpitude of the offence would have been determined by that standard; so that a precedent might then have been some evidence of the extent and application of the previous law. But as there was no law, we are compelled to infer that one was made to reach the case, and made, of course, only for that case. So that, in the language of Mr. Jefferson, (speaking of precedents in cases of contempts,) "the judgment on any particular case is the law of that case only, and dies with it. When a new, and even a similar case arises, the judgment which is to make, and at the same time apply the law, is open to question, and consideration, as are all new laws."

But if you adopt these precedents, how far will you go with them? Is this House prepared to go the full length of the tether which has been stretched by the English Parliaments? The cases which have occurred in this country are confessedly founded on them. How much further will you follow them through the scenes of violence and passion which produced them? The English Parliament has decided that the privilege of a member arises by force of the election, and that he possesses it even before a return be made. Some of the members on this floor were elected nearly two years since. Have we been all this time clothed with the mantle of privilege? It has been decided also by that Parliament, that any assault upon the person, or any attack upon the reputation of a member, although in a matter not connected with his official duties, is a breach of privilege. Is this House prepared to punish all the aspersions upon the private characters of its members which have been made within two years? Will you send your Sergeant-at-Arms to the District of Maine for any editor of a newspaper who may have traduced any member of this House? Should you exercise your power to that extent, I need not ask how much time this House would have left to discharge its ordinary legislative duties. You must either take the whole power furnished by these precedents, or you must reject the whole; for there is no dividing line between any of them. Permit me to pursue this doctrine still further. It has been decided in England, that any interposition of the King to affect any measure before either House of Parliament, was a breach of privilege. Luckily for that Parliament, there was a prerogative that met the privilege; as the King could do no wrong, he could not be punished; and for that reason, I presume, among others more important, the attempt to punish was not made. But, sir, the decision remains among the precious bundle of precedents, ready to be produced when occasion may require. Suppose, then, what cannot with propriety be supposed, except for the purpose of illustration, that the President should think proper to interpose on a subject before Congress, and should tell us that it was not worth our pains to legislate upon any particular measure, because he had determined to put his veto on it; should we venture to send our Sergeant-at-Arms for the President, and bring him to our bar? No man in his senses could think of it. Where, then, will you stop? If you once acknowledge the principle that the common law established by the precedents of the English Parliament is our law, where, at what point will you arrest your career in the course of privilege and prerogative? If we borrow from England the doctrine of privilege, why may not any future Executive loan for a short time that of prerogative? One step more; create a star-chamber judiciary to sanction and enforce your claims, and we shall have reached the goal of our course. The whole doctrine is uncongenial with our institutions; it has no root here; it cannot flourish, even if it were watered by the tears of any who may cast a longing, lingering look behind, at the charms of aristocracy, and the comforts of despotism.

In the proceedings against this man, we have arrived at the brink of an abyss, where it much behoves us to pause and reflect; a single step may cast us into it, without our having sounded its depth or measured its extent. Let us hesitate before we spring into it; and if we be determined to plunge, let us at least explore the ground, and know where we are to land.

I cannot apologize, I disdain to make an apology for having brought this subject to the consideration of the House. Its infinite importance will vindicate me. If the House should be determined to proceed in the exercise of the power claimed in this instance, I shall at least have the consolation of reflecting that I have discharged my duty in protesting against that power, as a violation of the charter of our liberties, and as jeopardizing, in an imminent degree, the personal liberty of the citizen.

Mr. ANDERSON, of Kentucky, declared that he should support the resolutions offered to the House. His only objection was to the expression of doubt contained in the preamble; he felt no doubt, and thought the prisoner should be instantly discharged. It might indeed produce some mortification, for the House now to retrace its steps, and to make a public acknowledgment of its imbecility, but he thought this course much preferable to an assumption of the Constitutional powers now contended for. He himself participated in the mortification, but felt the necessity of giving the most prompt correction to the error which had been committed in issuing the warrant. It was much better now to arrest the proceedings, than to conduct the case through an examination, and be compelled to adopt that course; an idea then might justifiably arise that the discharge was produced by a belief that the man was innocent, or that the case did not merit punishment. It should be placed on its true ground; the prisoner should be immediately discharged, from a want of power in this House to punish. If this power be possessed, it is indeed most novel and extraordinary. In every other case, an act, which is punishable, must, by a previous law, have been declared an offence. In this, the guilt of the individual does not rest on any statute previously passed and promulgated, but on the feelings and passions of this House. In vain do we demand the law, which has declared the act an offence at the time of its commission. In vain may the citizen look for the rule of his conduct in the statute book of his country. There is no law declaring the act, we are about to punish, a contempt or an offence of any kind; our opinion of its criminality has been locked within our own breasts, and never can be constitutionally declared except by a law of Congress. No other tribunal has ever yet dared to assume such a power, and if it be exercised, no citizen in this country can be safe. But if the doctrine is recognised that we can declare an act after it is committed an offence, according to our views of the privileges of the House, or the nature of contempts, we are at once plunged in a sea of perplexity. There is no subject on which the varying minds of men can differ more. That act which one will declare the grossest contempt, will, by another, be thought perfectly harmless. We shall have no previous standard by which we can measure the act; the fact of its being an offence will depend on the wide and differing views of members of this House. If we reserve to ourselves the power of declaring every paragraph in the newspapers defamatory or libellous, as our feelings may direct, and which no law has forbidden, we are indeed possessed of powers, of which the people of this country have little thought, and which, by reading the Constitution, they can never find.

If, however, it should be conceded that this was an offence, unless there has been a punishment previously affixed by law, we are still powerless and must arrest these proceedings. By what authority can we award any punishment, or imprisonment, in preference to any other? There is none in the Constitution, and there is no law on the subject. What necessary connexion is there between contempt and imprisonment? They seem to be spoken of as if one was a necessary consequence of the other. It arises, Mr. Speaker, from the provisions of the common law, and the usages of the British Parliament, which are fastened about our recollections, and are difficult to be shaken off. We forget that the powers of the House of Commons depend on precedents formed by their own decisions, and ours only on special grants in the Constitution. This House alone cannot create a punishment which has not been affixed by law; by both branches of the Legislature. An apt illustration of the idea is found in the provisions of the Constitution, which define treason, and empower Congress to prescribe the punishment. If this power had never been exercised, and no statute had been enacted to declare the punishment, no court in this country could have created one. No judge would have dared to pass a sentence of death or imprisonment for a day. The vilest traitor that ever lived, can be punished only according to law in this land. The same observations apply to piracy, and felonies, committed on the high seas. Until Congress shall exercise the powers given by the Constitution, and define the crimes and declare the punishment, no tribunal in this country can supply the defect, and dare to punish according to the common law, or in any other way. If we can impose a penalty, which has not been assigned to a specific crime, there is then no boundary to our powers. When we determine that this House possess the power of punishment, then the species or degree is only matter of selection. Who can prescribe the limit? We have no standard to regulate or bind our power, but our own feeling. We can range through every gradation of punishment, from a simple reprimand to death. And when the principle of punishment is decided, we may to-morrow be boldly debating whether we shall reprimand, imprison, brand, or gibbet this man. If this resolution be rejected, we shall, in effect, decide that the House of Representatives possess the power not only of declaring any act an offence, but of selecting and inflicting a punishment heretofore unknown to the laws, and even to ourselves. These are indeed tremendous powers, and such as I believe have never been granted.

The gentleman from Georgia (Mr. Forsyth) asked, yesterday, what would be the course of this House, if a person in the galleries should insult a member by hissing, or throwing nuts at his head? The question has been answered by the gentleman who last addressed you. But those who support the power of the House, must remember that they do not extricate themselves from the difficulty of propounding perplexing questions. They hold the affirmative of the proposition, and cannot expect us to follow them, unless they show the way clearly and distinctly. The answer, however, which he would give, and which would release the House from all embarrassment, would be to pass a law accurately defining every offence, and assigning a punishment to each. On the subject of our power to give such a law operation within the District of Columbia, there can be no doubt. The power of "exclusive legislation in all cases whatsoever," was given to enable Congress to place at a distance everything which could overawe its proceedings, or in any way obstruct its impartial deliberations. Any law may be passed which is necessary to insure to a member of the House perfect exemption from insult, and to enable him in every way impartially and fearlessly to discharge his duties. Within the "ten miles square" there was no difficulty; for the pettiest offender within the District could be punished only by authority of an act of Congress, either specially embracing the case, or adopting the laws of Virginia or Maryland on the subject. It is possible that a doubt might be created as to contempts, or other offences against the privileges of the House, committed beyond this exclusive jurisdiction; and we must then resort to the authority "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution" the powers of Congress. But in no event could much practical inconvenience result, as it could very rarely happen that any contempt, shown beyond the District, could seriously obstruct the transaction of the public business.

It has been urged that the State Legislatures and courts of justice punish contempts, and it is demanded, if Congress shall not exercise this power. No legislature or court can exercise it without law. In all the States they are authorized either by statutes specially, or by the common law, recognised by the statutes or the State constitutions. Congress can by law prescribe a punishment, and the mode of awarding it. Until this is done, one House cannot make the offence, and then punish it. He thought the warrant should be set aside. Still he could cast censure on no one, as no member of the House had voted for the warrant more promptly than he did. If the prisoner had then been present, it was probable he would not have postponed the punishment, even to read the Constitution.

Mr. FORSYTH, of Georgia, said, he would not follow the gentlemen through the long course of their arguments. He relied on their own admissions, as abundantly sufficient to justify the proceedings which had been and which were proposed to be adopted.

It is admitted that we have power to suppress disorder in the gallery, to remove the offender from the hall. Is not this removal of a citizen of the United States, of a freeman, from your gallery, in which, while it continues open, he has as much right to sit there as we have to sit here, a punishment for a crime or contempt which he has committed? Is it not, if not justified by law, an assault, and false imprisonment, for which the officer acting under your orders is answerable, by suit and by indictment? Whence arises the power? Will gentlemen point to the clause of the Constitution which confers it? Here then is a case in which, from the necessity of the case, no gentleman will venture to deny the existence of the authority to punish, and the propriety of its exercise. But does it stop here? Are we permitted to remove the nuisance only beyond the walls of this room. Extends it no farther? Cannot our deliberations be interrupted at the door, and on the staircase? The same reasoning will apply to all portions of the House and to the street. Does it stop here? Will you permit the beating of drums and the firing of cannon under your windows, in the street, in front of this hall? Can we not remove such nuisances, and prevent their recurrence, by the punishment of those who caused them, for their contempt to this body? Certainly no one can deny it. We have, therefore, by admission, the power within and without these walls. Where is the limit, Mr. F. said? It was limited only by the jurisdiction of the United States, because to the extent of the jurisdiction was the necessity of the legitimate exercise of the power.

Mr. F. did not conceive those clauses of the Constitution, quoted by the gentleman from New York, applicable to the present case. The person in custody is charged with a contempt, punished summarily in all cases—not for an offence indictable and punishable by the ordinary course of judicial proceedings. Every gentleman, whether of the profession of the law or not, will know the distinction, and that these clauses of the Constitution were framed without any view to the exercise of this power to punish contempts, and without any intention to prevent its exercise.

But we are told, that this miserable man is called here to answer to some unknown law. He was somewhat at loss to understand the force of the remark; if it was meant to convey the idea, that there is no law of Congress defining the bribery of a member of Congress as a crime, and affixing an appropriate punishment, it was true. But if it meant, what it can only mean, if used with an application to this case, that we proposed to make an action, in itself innocent, criminal, and punishable, Mr. T. said, he must express his astonishment at the declaration. Ignorant indeed must be that man, who does not know that this action was not criminal in the highest degree. Every man carries in his own bosom a faithful monitor, instructing him how enormous is such an offence. He has committed an offence against a law known to him and to all mankind, for which, Mr. F. trusted, he would be punished as far the power of the House would permit.

Mr. F. said, the gentleman from New York acknowledged the force of precedents in judicial proceedings; there they are highly useful landmarks, not to be departed from without danger; but in legislative proceedings they are dangerous things. Mr. F. could not perceive the propriety of the distinction. A precedent in one place is omnipotent; in another a succession of precedents are to be disregarded. The judgments pronounced in similar cases, by the House of Representatives, were assailed, on the ground that they were established under the influence of passion. The gentleman, Mr. F. apprehended, had not examined the history of the cases to which he referred; he would find that they were established on due deliberation. If he would compare the conduct of this House, and that of the House of Representatives in '96, in the case of Randall and Whitney, he would find that sufficient cooling time had been furnished the House of Representatives before the commission of the fact. This House, yesterday, under the influence of violent indignation, adopted unanimously the proposition to arrest the offender. To-day we are cool enough to examine with critical accuracy and scrutinizing care, into the extent of our Constitutional authority to protect ourselves from the approaches of corruption, or the assaults of violence, while in the performance of our public duties. In the case of Randall, the offender was brought day after day before the House; he had counsel who defended his cause, and urged all the suggestions in his favor which his case would justify. He was, by a majority of four to one, deliberately condemned and deliberately punished, by a confinement of three weeks, for the contempt he had committed.

The gentleman from New York had read to the House the arguments which were made use of, on an occasion subsequent to that to which Mr. F. had referred, against the power of the House, and the observations of Mr. Jefferson thereon. Mr. F. called the attention of the House to the arguments, which the gentleman had not read, from the same authority. In debating the legality of an order issued by the other branch of the Legislature—an order of an extraordinary character, Mr. F. said, and one which he would not have consented to issue—for the apprehension of the editor of a newspaper, it was “insisted, in support of it, that every man by the law of nature, and every body of men, possesses the right of self-defence; that all public functionaries are essentially invested with the powers of self-preservation; that they have an inherent right to do all acts necessary to keep themselves in a condition to discharge the trusts confided to them; that, whenever authorities are given, the means of carrying them into execution are given, by necessary implication; that thus we see the British Parliament exercise the right of punishing contempts; all the State Legislatures exercise the same power, and every court does the same; that, if we have it not, we sit at the mercy of every intruder who may enter our doors or gallery, and, by noise and tumult, render proceeding in business impracticable; that, if our tranquillity is to be perpetually disturbed by newspaper defamation, it will not be possible to exercise our functions with the requisite coolness and deliberation; and that we must therefore have a power to punish these disturbers of our peace and proceedings.”

That precedent, therefore, was established, Mr. F. said, on the inherent right of the House, to do all acts necessary to the due exercise of the trust confided to them. This was the foundation on which, in this particular case, the power of the House was vested.

There was a certain class of powers, Mr. F. said, every day exercised by this House, something analogous to that which was the subject of debate. Whence was derived the power, which was frequently exercised by this House, and which was even frequently conferred on its subordinate committees, of sending for persons and papers? Did any one doubt the right of the House to do this? Was the right, which was of every day's practice, doubted? [Some gentleman here intimated that he did question this power.] Mr. F. said the power existed from necessity. How could the House ascertain the guilt or innocence of a public offender, whose conduct should be arraigned before it, without that power? It was essentially necessary that it should have it, to compel the attendance of witnesses, and the production of papers in their possession. That power had therefore been, and always must be, exercised without dispute; though there was nothing in the Constitution conferring that power on the House. The power arose by necessary implication from the duty imposed upon the House of examining into the conduct of the officers of the Government. Was not the analogy between the cases perfect? Here, said he, we have exercised the power of bringing a man before us for an offence which, if permitted to pass unpunished, will render it a disgrace, instead of an honor, to be a member of this House. Mr. F. concluded by saying, he trusted that in this case the House would do all they had hitherto done; that they would examine the accused, whether he denies or admits the charge; and, the offence being proved upon him, that he would be duly punished.

Mr. BARBOUR, of Virginia, said, that he was induced to ask the indulgence of the House whilst he submitted his view of this subject, not only because there was a great Constitutional question involved, but because he had acquiesced in the issuing of the warrant, upon which he was now decidedly of opinion that the House ought not further to proceed.

We are called upon, said he, to decide this question: whether the House of Representatives have the power to punish the person at its bar, for an attempt to bribe the chairman of one of its committees. After the most mature deliberation which he had been able to bestow upon the subject, he said he was satisfied that the House had not that power; that he would endeavor to state, as succinctly as he could, the reasons upon which that opinion was founded.

The attempt imputed to the person at the bar of the House, and about which there was no doubt, in point of fact, seemed to him to present itself in these two points of view: First, as a crime, to be punished because of its own enormity; secondly, as a breach of the privileges of a member of this House. As to the first proposition there could be but one opinion. The act complained of is one of the most abhorrent kind; but the word crime, ex vi termini, imported a violation of some law, either in the omission of some act enjoined by it, or in the commission of some act forbidden by it. That law must have been enacted by the legislative power—that is, by the consent of the two Houses of Congress. Now, as it was conceded on all hands that no such law had passed, as it was clear that no such law could now pass, so as by an ex post facto operation to relate back, and embrace this case; as, too, the execution of a law, by the infliction of punishment, belonged to judicial cognizance, the conclusion followed, too clearly to require further comment, that the act committed, or attempted to be committed, could not be punished by this House as a crime within itself. He spoke not here of the common law, which punishes crimes against the laws of morality—that law did not exist in relation to the United States; and if it did, this was not the tribunal to enforce it. We come now, said Mr. B., to the great question in this case, it is this: Was the attempt complained of a breach of the privileges of a member of this House? He said he would attempt to show that it was not.

If, indeed, this question was to be decided by the Lex Parliamentaria of Great Britain, he would not undertake to say what might be the decision; but, said he, we have a much better and surer guide—we have the Constitution of the United States to point out the course which we ought to pursue. It was that instrument, he said, which called into existence every department of the Federal Government, and which created this House as a branch of one of those departments; it was that which marked out the powers of the Legislature as a whole, and the powers of this House as a constituent part, as well as the privileges of its members.

By reference to the Constitution, it would be found that the matter of privilege was not left to construction. The framers of that instrument were deeply versed in the nature and history of Parliamentary privileges. They knew that, though they were undefined, because they had been said to be undefinable, they were marked with one strong characteristic feature—that they had perpetually advanced, that they had never retrograded. They therefore, in the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution, had accurately defined the privileges of members; they made them to consist, first, in a qualified exemption "from arrest during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to, and returning from, the same;" and, secondly, "that for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place." Here, then, was the extent of our privileges.

He thought that, according to this universal principle of construction, that the mention of one thing was the exclusion of another, it was obvious that the Constitution had intended to restrain privilege, and tie it down to the particular cases stated in the section which he had just cited. But to put this subject in a point of view, if possible, still stronger, he begged leave to refer the House to the third section of Jefferson's Manual, in which will be found an enumeration of the privileges claimed by the British Parliament. That enumeration embraced, besides many others, the two cases mentioned in the Constitution. Hence it must be most obvious, that the Constitution did not intend to adopt the Parliamentary law upon the subject of privilege; because, as that covered a much larger ground, if it had been intended to have given the whole, it is difficult, if not impossible, to assign a reason why it should have been thought necessary, by special enumeration, to have given a part.

There was no man in the House, he said, who could hold the attempt which had been made in greater abhorrence than himself; but whilst he considered it a daring attempt at wickedness, an outrageous insult to the feelings of the member, and as calculated to excite the detestation of all good men, yet it was not, as he thought he had proven, a breach of privilege. If it were not, then there could be no principle on which the House could pretend to take cognizance of it. There were many insults which might be offered to the members of this House, for which they had no remedy but those which were open to every other citizen. And, indeed, he referred the House to the same section of the parliamentary manual, to which he had before called their attention, to show, that, in a case of acknowledged breach of privilege, as, for example, the arrest of a member, the effect of such unauthorized arrest is, that the member is entitled to be discharged, and the persons concerned in the arrest are liable to action or indictment for their injurious violation of the member's privilege; but he did not believe that even in that case the House could inflict any punishment on the persons concerned for a contempt itself. But gentlemen had taken another ground in debating this subject; they had said that the mere creation of a legislative body, ipso facto, imparted to that body certain rights, and, amongst others, the right of self-defence; that as they had the power, so it was their duty to keep themselves pure; and for that purpose to punish any attempt upon the integrity of its members. This reasoning, said Mr. B., is too broad. Congress is the creature of the Constitution; it has, therefore, as he had observed in a former part of his argument, just those powers, and those only, which the Constitution had given it; and whatever powers are not given we must be content to think were not thought necessary. To Congress, composed of the two Houses, it had given the legislative power which it granted. But this was clearly no act of legislation; first, because it was a proceeding proposed to be carried on by one branch of Congress; and, secondly, because it did not propose to provide a punishment for future cases, but to inflict it upon one which had already occurred. But, besides the legislative power granted to Congress, as composed of the two Houses, there were certain powers granted to each of the Houses respectively. Let us then see what are given to the House of Representatives. They are all to be found in the second and fifth sections of the first article. He said there was no power given the House affirmatively to inflict punishment upon persons not members for any offence either against the House or its members. Was it to be inferred from the powers which were given? So far from it, he said, that he thought the inference deducible from the nature of the powers given almost irresistible, that such power was not intended. The great argument had been that the creation of the Legislature imparted to it certain inherent powers as a part of its nature and existence. Now, sir, said he, let me ask, what power could be more inherent, in a legislative body, than that of appointing their own Speaker? And yet this power is expressly given. What could be more inherent than the power to determine their own rules of proceeding? And yet this was expressly given. What could be more inherent than the right of punishing one of its own members for disorderly behaviour? And yet this was expressly given. He asked whether the giving powers like these, which, if there be any such thing as inherent powers, would have been so considered, did not incontestably prove that the Constitution meant not to leave this subject to doubtful construction, but, on the contrary, to give to the whole of the legislative body which it created, as well as to its several parts, the laws of its and their existence, and to impart to them by grant the powers necessary to the performance of their several functions. Sir, the framers of the Constitution meant to guard as carefully against the latitudinous construction which might be given to indefinite powers, as they did against indefinite privileges; they therefore determined to bring down both power and privilege to a Constitutional standard, so that they might be easily measured. It would have been a vain thing to have circumscribed Congress in its legislative power, if the two Houses which compose it had been left, like the British Parliament, to range at large, in the wide field of inherent powers, and indefinite privileges. If, said Mr. B., the House had power to take cognizance of this case and to punish it, where would they stop? This insult or this attempt upon one of the members was committed not in this House, but in the District of Columbia; suppose it had been committed in an extreme part of the United States, would our jurisdiction have reached the offender there, and should our Sergeant-at-Arms have been sent to arrest him? The consequences to which this doctrine would lead seemed to him to show that it could not be sustained. Nor, said he, is there so much danger to be apprehended from the contrary doctrine as gentlemen seem to suppose; he thanked God the attempts which had been made were but few, and in each instance had failed; if they should hereafter be repeated, he hoped and believed there was a long, very long, tract of future time between us and that period when they should prevail; if any attempt of this kind fail, the man who makes it is foiled in his wicked effort, and covered with disgrace; if unhappily it should ever succeed, we have a Constitutional remedy at hand: by expulsion, we may drive from us the unworthy member, and, having cut off the gangrenous limb, the rest of the political body will be restored to health. True, sir, the expulsion of a member requires the concurrence of two-thirds; but does any gentleman doubt for a moment but that if the acceptance of a bribe were proven, two-thirds, ay, three-thirds, would instantly unite in a vote for the expulsion of him who should have accepted?

But, gentlemen have asked if the House have not the power now contended for, whence is derived the power to remove noise and disturbance from the gallery? Whence the power to send for persons and papers in prosecuting an inquiry before a committee? In relation to the first, he answered, that, by the Constitution, each House had a right to determine the rule of its proceedings; now it was competent for the House, in establishing the rules of its proceedings, to say whether any person should come within the walls or not; to say that when they were thus admitted, they might continue so long as they conducted themselves in an orderly manner, and, when they act otherwise, that the Doorkeeper whom the Constitution authorized it to appoint, by the authority given it to appoint its officers, should turn out such disorderly person; accordingly one of our rules directs, in substance, that the Speaker shall take care to have all disorder removed from the gallery. It is, said Mr. B., our House, provided for the purposes of legislation; as we have a right to say who shall come in, and when, so also have we a right to say, when the persons admitted by our courtesy shall be put out. In relation to the second, he said, the same power to establish the rules of our proceeding and to appoint our officers, to which he had before referred, authorized us to prescribe the manner in which any inquiry of which we have Constitutional jurisdiction shall be conducted, and to appoint a Sergeant-at-Arms for executing the necessary process, &c., for carrying on that inquiry; but these rules must have relation to the object of carrying on some business which was properly before the House or its committees.

Mr. B. said, that he had now given his view of the question before them; he hoped he had satisfied the House that it had not the Constitutional power to punish the person at its bar. But, if there were even a doubt upon the subject, he called upon gentlemen to recollect, that in ordinary cases a party was tried under some pre-existing law announced to the people; that one power enacted the law and another executed it; that neither the Legislature enacting, nor the Judiciary expounding was a party; but that here, in the same sentence, they were called upon to announce the rule, and to give judgment, by applying that rule to the particular circumstances before them; and that too, said he, in a case in which we ourselves are the parties. We thus legislate and adjudge in our own case. This has been said to be the very definition of tyranny. Sir, said Mr. B., I am not afraid that this House would practise oppression in the particular case before us; but, let it be remembered, that constitutions and laws are not made for good men and good times, but for bad men and bad times; as, on the one hand, experience has shown, that men, as men, will do wrong; so, on the other hand, the same experience shows that men, as political agents, ought to be controlled by some checks. Laws are intended for the first; constitutions for the second. With regard to the individual at the bar of the House, whatever may be our feelings towards him, it should be remembered that, in his person, we are settling a great question of Constitutional law.

Mr. ROBERTSON, of Louisiana, asked the attention of the House for a few moments. He would not travel over the ground which had been so well and so fully occupied by gentlemen who had preceded him. He would not repeat their arguments, nor restate their views, further than was necessary to explain and to connect his own opinions. Thus restricted, he had but little to add. Before, however, entering on the subject, he would remark, that he did not agree with the gentleman from Kentucky, in the mortification he had expressed at being compelled to retrace his steps. When the detestable conduct of Anderson was made known to the House, it produced strong and universal indignation; under the impulse of honest feelings, they had unanimously resolved to bring the culprit before them; but now they had had time for reflection, reason resumed her empire over the mind, and he (Mr. R.) was prepared, although reluctantly, to abandon the impulses of sentiment, for the colder dictates of judgment.

The gentleman from New York (Mr. SPENCER) has, with great ability, pointed out the rights of the citizen, and very satisfactorily shown, that, without a denial of them, we cannot proceed further in the present prosecution. But yet something more was left to be done. The rights of the citizen under the Constitution are sometimes made to yield to powers vested in the Government, or the departments thereof; and the gentlemen from Kentucky and Virginia (Messrs. ANDERSON and BARBOUR) have, with much clearness and precision, demonstrated that there is no power vested in this House by which it may prostrate rights otherwise so positively secured to the citizen. These rights, again I say, have been fairly stated by the gentleman from New York; and, in the case now before us, however infamous it may be, they remain untouched by any legitimate exercise of the power of this House.

The Congress of the United States possesses none but delegated powers, both in regard to the community, and the two Houses of which it is composed. Each House, and each member, has its rights; but they are not arbitrary—they are not left to be asserted at pleasure—they are written down and clearly ascertained. It is with this latter branch of the subject that we are now alone concerned; and no farther concerned than as it respects the privileges of the House, or its members. The privilege of the House, under the Constitution, consists in the power it possesses over its own members and proceedings; the privilege of the members, in their exemption from arrest, and from being questioned elsewhere for what is said in the House. Is Anderson's offence a breach of privilege? Surely not, if there are no other privileges than those enumerated. But it is a contempt, an insult; it is all that, and more. But the Constitution and laws of the United States are silent on these subjects; and, although I will not say that we have no power to legislate on them, I do think that we cannot act on them without previous legislation. With a view to a better understanding of this subject, I have examined, with some care, the constitutions of the different States of the Union; and I find that, although the State Legislatures are said to have plenary power to represent their constituents completely, and to possess all powers not expressly denied them, that yet it has been thought better to define and limit their powers than to leave them in the breasts of those for whose more immediate and personal benefit they were to be exercised. Accordingly, the constitutions of New Hampshire, Massachusetts, Maryland, South Carolina, Ohio, Georgia, Tennessee, and Vermont, define the privileges of the respective Houses of their Legislatures in the same manner as is observed in the Constitution of the United States: while others of the States, where privilege is not defined, expressly give all powers necessary for a branch of the Legislature of a free and independent State. The Houses of the State Legislatures would not contend for other privileges than those expressly given, although it is generally true that they possess all powers not expressly denied. How, then, can this House, which has no powers but such as have been granted, contend for privileges not enumerated in the Constitution?

But, say gentlemen, this is a question not of privilege, but of contempt, of insult, of disrespect. Privileges are defined and limited, but we are the sole judges of our powers in regard to contempt. It would seem, then, from this view of the subject, that our powers, in respect of privilege, cannot be so extended as to embrace contempts and insults; but that here we stand on better grounds, for we can not only create the power, but judge of its extent. Thus, sir, are we weak and restricted where power is given; but, if it be not given at all, strong and irresistible.

The States, jealous of legislative bodies more responsible than the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States, have not left with their own immediate Legislatures unlimited and discretionary power in regard to contempts, insults, and other similar offences. They have not only said in what they shall consist, but how they shall be punished; and I can find no offence whatever, of this description, punishable by either branch of any State Legislature, unless it be committed in presence of the House. Thus it is provided by the constitutions I have before spoken of, that each House may punish any disrespect, by disorderly behaviour, in its presence, by imprisonment, not exceeding thirty days, in some of the States, and twenty-four hours, in others. But the powers of the State Legislatures would not reach the case before us, because, if it be a contempt or insult, it is not offered in presence of the House; and, if it be anything done not in its presence, or view, that the House can punish, then it must be a breach of privilege; but privilege, is freedom from arrest and question, for observations made in the House, and nothing more.

H. OF R.

Case of Colonel Anderson.

JANUARY, 1818.

Taking, then, into consideration the satisfactory views of the gentlemen who have preceded me, together with the provisions of the State constitutions, I am forced to conclude, that the House can punish no citizen for any act whatever, done or committed without their presence, unless it be a breach of privilege, or breach of a privilege given by the Constitution; and, further, that it can punish no contempt, insult, or outrage, that is not offered in its presence. The infamous proposition of Anderson is not a breach of a privilege; it is a contempt, an insult, an outrage, but it is not done in presence of the House, and is, unfortunately, punishable in neither case. The doctrine I contend for, however convenient and restrictive, is explicit and defined, and at the same time sufficiently broad to protect this House and its members in the free exercise of their rights. While, on the other hand, the principles of gentlemen, who contend for power to punish the act under consideration, are vague and unsatisfactory, unlimited and uncontrolled but by their own discretion.

MR. TUCKER, of Virginia, said there was one thing at least in which he would most heartily concur with the gentleman from New York, who had offered these resolutions to the House; that the exercise of the power of committing for a contempt of this body, was of so embarrassing a character; and was, in some respects, so little consonant with the general principles to which we yield our assent, that it was desirable another mode should be adopted of punishing offences of so deep a dye, without bringing the offender for his trial and punishment before the body whose privileges had been infringed, and whose dignity had been insulted. It was for this reason that, on a former day, he had intimated an intention of submitting to the consideration of the House a resolution similar to one of those now under consideration, directing a bill to be reported for the punishment of the offence of bribing, or attempting to corrupt a member of Congress. It was for this reason also that, however heinous the offence of the party whose case was now before the House, he was, on the present occasion, disposed to manifest towards him the greatest moderation and forbearance. He was so averse to the exercise of a power to punish, where the offence and the punishment are so undefined, and where the tribunal which judges cannot fail to be animated with indignation against the offender, that he was inclined, on the present occasion, to dismiss the party, after the offence had been inquired into, without farther punishment than the reprimand of the Speaker; and to provide for any future case by the enactment of a law imposing penalties adequate to the offence.

But, while he was disposed to this course, he could not assent to the proposition of the gentleman from New York, which disavows any authority in this House to punish the offence, as a contempt. It appeared to him essential that this power should exist in the House of Representatives, though it might be wise in them to relieve themselves for the future from the embarrassment of exercising the privilege themselves, by providing for its punishment by law. While he could not doubt of the Constitutional powers of the House on this occasion, he would ask gentlemen what would be our situation, if we were without such powers? What would be the effect of promulgating to the world that the House of Representatives was at all times to be approached with impunity by the vilest corruption? That bribes might be offered, without hazard, by the most infamous of mankind, and that the Constitution had left this body without the means of preserving pure the fountains of legislation, and of protecting itself from so vile a contamination! He should hesitate much before he should adopt a proposition which might lead to such dangerous results; and he should be diligent in examining the principles of the Constitution before he could give his assent to a doctrine which would sap the purity of this body, for the preservation of which that Constitution was so solicitous.

Nor was he disposed to coincide in the opinion of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) that, as it is at least doubtful whether we possess the power asserted, we should decline the exercise of it. He was not satisfied that there was a reasonable doubt of our powers. Ingenuity may throw obscurity and difficulty around every proposition. Nor did he perceive what part of the Constitution prescribed to us as a rule, to reject the exercise of every power where doubt could be thrown around it. On the contrary, in taking the solemn oath to support the Constitution, to which another gentleman had so emphatically alluded, he felt himself equally bound to preserve to the Federal Government, and to this body, their just powers, as to guard against encroachment on the rights of the States, or an extension of the powers of the Union. It was equally the duty of every member of this body to prevent the most vigorous and useful branches from being lopped off, as to array himself in opposition to every assertion of unconstitutional powers. Upon all occasions of this kind, however doubtful and embarrassed might be the question, it was the solemn duty of every member to examine it according to the best lights which Heaven has given him, and to pronounce fearlessly the result. It was this course he should endeavor to pursue in presenting a very few remarks on the Constitutional powers of this House.

There were, he observed, two kinds of powers granted by this Constitution: enumerated powers, and incidental or accessory powers; the first expressly specified in the Constitution, the latter falling under the general grant of all "necessary and proper powers," which terminates the enumeration of the powers conferred on the General Government. The latter, indeed, would have existed independent of that clause, since, according to the principles of common reason, when a power is given to do an act, a power of employing the means necessary to its execution is also given, by implication.

While, therefore, it is readily admitted, in relation to these two classes of powers, that the power now asserted is not expressly given, it is confidently alleged to be fairly incidental to the power of legislation; and it will be contended—That the power to punish bribery of a member of this House, is vested somewhere in the Federal Government; and, that this power of punishing belongs to the House of Representatives, independent of the other branches of Government.

That a legislative body should exist without any power to punish the offence of bribing its members, is a proposition which seems too monstrous to be alleged. Hence it is that gentlemen seem disposed to acknowledge a power in the Legislature to pass a law which shall prescribe a punishment for the offence, though they deny the power of this House to proceed to consider and treat it as a contempt. And where, let me ask, can gentlemen who are so technically accurate in the construction of the Constitution, discover that clause of the instrument which expressly grants the power to enact such a law? There is none. The boundaries of the Constitution cannot be laid down with mathematical precision, by the square and compass. They must be ascertained by the principles of sound reason and common sense, and by the exercise of a just discretion. While, therefore, we cannot discover the power even to legislate on this subject, in the express provision of the instrument, it is doubtless fairly incidental to the power of legislation. It is inconceivable that the convention which framed the Constitution should have intended the creation of a legislative body, which should be without the power of self-protection; without the right to assume to itself freedom from disturbance; without the means of securing order in its deliberations; and without the privilege of preserving itself entirely free from the influence of fear, or the corruptions of gold. Some of these incidents to legislation, gentlemen have been compelled to admit. In what a situation should we be, if our deliberations were to be affected by the hisses or the applause of the gallery; if an obnoxious member were to be put down by the threats or tumult of the audience, and a favorite speaker cheered on a favorite subject by shouts of approbation? Can gentlemen deny that we have power to prevent these things? The gentleman from Virginia appears to confine us, even under these circumstances, to the remedy of excluding those who are riotous. Within the walls alone have we power to act, and then only power to exclude—not to punish. Suppose, then, the rioter returns, or betakes himself to the street, and throws stones at your windows. He is without your doors. Have you no power over him? Have you not accessarily even those powers which every court of justice possesses, without the express provisions of law? If you have not, the situation of this body is deplorable indeed. If you have, where will you draw the line of distinction? What is more important, even in the order and decorum of the House, than the preserving the mind of every member free from the suggestions of fear—the seductions of profit—the grovelling desire of gain—the influence of corruption? What shall we say if an attempt be made to control, by threats or by a challenge, the free and deliberate exercise of his judgment, by the representative of the people? Though the challenge be given without the walls, is not its effect to be felt within; and is it not this (and not the place where the act is done) which must be considered as determining the powers of Congress? The principle on which it can interfere in any case, is the right to prevent its deliberations from being disturbed; and whether this disturbance be produced by an act in the gallery, in the street, in the highway, or in the closet, the body must equally have the power to secure to itself the exercise of free will in the discharge of its legislative functions. And if these principles be correct—if they justify a right to punish occasional disorder, how much more important the privilege of preventing the inroads of corruption, at the same time so insidious and so fatal?

But the gentleman from Virginia, who has argued this question with his usual ability, relies very confidently on that clause of the Constitution which secures to members freedom from arrest; and from the expression of the privileges contained in this clause, he argues that no other privilege can be presumed to have been intended. But, in an instrument like this, in which so many instances occur of surplussage, and of the express grant of powers, which (though not expressed) would have followed as incidental, no fair argument can be deduced from the express mention of one privilege against the existence of others. To exemplify this position; the Constitution gives the power of "declaring war," and the power of "raising armies and creating navies." Might not the power of making rules for the government of the land and naval forces be fairly considered as incidental? Could it have been intended by the convention to confer the power of raising an army without the power of governing it? And yet we find that, though this power would have been fairly considered as accessorial, yet it is inserted among the express or enumerated powers. Nor is this the only instance in the Constitution—they are frequent. They proceed from the imperfection of all human transactions, an imperfection from which, in these respects, our Constitution is not free.

It is not therefore fair to conclude that we have, as a body, no other privileges, even if some privileges be granted expressly by the Constitution. But there is, in truth, a distinction between the privileges of members and the privileges of the House. The first would have no existence but for the provision of the Constitution, the latter cannot but exist as an incident to legislation. The former are those which are specified in the clause referred to; the latter are more extensive in their character, and a breach of them constitutes what is generally considered and denominated a contempt.

Mr. T. said that, if it had been sufficiently established that the power of punishing an attempt to bribe a member of this House is vested by the Constitution somewhere in the Federal Government, it would be not less easy to prove that the power must exist in this House independently of the other branches of the Government. In other words, however advisable it may be to provide by law for the punishment of the offence, this House may protect itself, even if there be no such law. For how do we deduce the power to pass a law? From the delegation of an express power? By no means; but from the necessity of its existence to enable the legislative body to perform its high and important functions, without the taint of corruption. If, then, this necessity gives the power at all, it equally requires the authority to exercise it to be vested in this House, independently of the Senate, and particularly of the Executive. For, if the House of Representatives can only be protected by the passage of a law, it must depend for its protection on the Senate at least, and perhaps on the Executive also. And what may not be the situation of this House if it is hereafter to depend for its privileges, and its protection from the influence of corruption, upon the Executive branch of the Government? Is that branch of the Government from which, according to the true theory of our free Constitution, the greater danger of corruption is to be feared. It is from that branch of the Government that the purity of the legislative body has been always most in danger, and by which it has been always most assailed. Gentlemen will not understand me as having the remotest allusion to the present Executive, for whom, under varying circumstances, whether popular or unpopular, I have always entertained respect. But we are told, and truly told, by the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) that laws and constitutions are made for bad men, and have their deep foundations laid in the iniquity of our nature. When the days of purity and virtue shall have passed away, and an Executive Magistrate shall attempt to influence this House, or any of its members, by its corruptions, how deplorable will be the condition of this body, if it must depend upon such an Executive to give its assent to laws to preserve the House of the people from such pollution! What are the petty attempts of such a man as John Anderson to the dangerous and fatal influence and intrigues of a designing and artful Chief Magistrate, if such should ever fill the Presidential chair? Can it be on such an one that the convention could ever have intended we should depend for our protection from the assaults of violence, or the wiles of corruption? Can that convention, whose work contains so many evidences of jealousy of Executive power and influence, have intended that this body should look for its power to punish a crime, to that branch of the Government which the history of the world has taught us, is under a constant temptation to commit it? I think not, sir; and while I feel satisfied that the power to punish exists somewhere, the same train of reasoning, convinces me that that power exists here, independent of every other branch of the Government, if we choose so to exert it.

Mr. T. said there were other views of the subject which he had been desirous of presenting; and particularly some remarks in reply to the latter part of the argument of the gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) who seemed to have conceded, by some of his positions, what he had so strenuously opposed in the commencement of his observations. But he should forbear to detain the House any longer, as other gentlemen were probably desirous of offering their views of the subject.

Mr. MERCER rose immediately after Mr. TUCKER, and addressed the House in substance as follows:

If the honorable gentleman who had just sat down felt it necessary to terminate his argument abruptly, rather than consume the time of the House, much more does it become me, sir, at this late hour of the day, to apologize for detaining you one moment longer.

Nor should I offer any observations on the subject of the present debate, if I were not inclined to sustain the authority of the House upon grounds somewhat different from those who have preceded me.

The resolutions on your table, Mr. Speaker, involve the decision of three distinct propositions. Has this House the power to punish contempt? Is the act charged upon the prisoner a contempt? Have the proceedings of the House been such as to warrant his further prosecution?

Does this House derive from the Constitution the power of punishing a contempt? My honorable colleague, who just preceded me, in a spirit of accommodation, I have no doubt, has proposed to introduce a bill to punish by law an attempt to bribe a member of Congress. If the power of punishing such an act is comprehended among the privileges of this House, the wisdom of any such law may well be questioned. Were the contemplated law restricted to a description of that particular species of contempt to which our consideration is now turned, it would not lead to the inference that this House recognised no other. And if, to obviate this difficulty, a complete enumeration were attempted of every possible insult to the privileges, rights, and dignity of this House, the proposed law would be swelled to the size of the largest volume on your table. It may also be doubted whether a right which this House does not derive from the Constitution can be created or protected by an act of ordinary legislation. Those gentlemen who are desirous for a law to define the privileges of this House and to provide for punishing the contempt of them, admit their existence, as well as the power of this House to punish their violation, by the mode of reasoning which they have adopted.

Before I inquire into the origin of this power, allow me to disavow every feeling which could militate against the most deliberate and impartial exercise of my judgment. I cannot but deplore the unhappy situation of the prisoner, whose head is bleached by the snows of many winters, and who, if really guilty of the atrocious act imputed to him, is an object of still greater commiseration, as his turpitude is without the extenuation of youth or inexperience.

Sir, said Mr. M., I never beheld a criminal arraigned at the bar of justice without this feeling; nor have I found it difficult to obey the legal injunction to believe the innocence of the accused until he has been heard in his defence and judicially convicted. This maxim of christian charity is comprehended in that admirable system of practical wisdom which has been repeatedly referred to in this discussion; a system matured by the experience of ages, adopted by the universal assent of the people of the United States, and denominated the common law.

It is to this system that I resort for the authority of this House to punish a contempt; to define the act to be punished; to determine the mode of proceeding against the accused; and, if guilty, to ascertain the quality, and measure the extent of his punishment.

And I do so, not because the common law confers these powers on this House, but because it defines that written Constitution from which we derive them.

Sir, there is not an entire article, not a solitary section, scarcely a line of that instrument, which can be correctly understood, or practically enforced, without a recurrence to this law.

If you desire to know the import of an English word, you turn to the lexicographer of England; for a phrase of statutory law you consult the statute which contains it, and the precedents by which it has been expounded. The terms of the common law must be also defined by a recurrence to the law itself, comprised in the treatises and illustrated by the history of the nation from whom we derive it.

The Constitution not only uses the terms and phrases of this law, but expressly recognises its existence. The seventh article of the amendments provides, that "in suits at common law, when the value of the controversy shall exceed twenty dollars, the right of trial by jury shall be preserved; and no fact tried by a jury shall be otherwise re-examined in any court of the United States than according to the rules of the common law;" of that law which gentlemen have asserted to have no existence under this Government, and against which the honorable member from New York would inspire us with apprehension and alarm.

That honorable member, in his late impressive address, admitted that the two Houses of the British Parliament possess the power of punishing contempts; that the Lex Parliamentaria, or usages of Parliament, is a part of the common law, although he denies a similar authority to the House of Representatives and Senate, the two branches of the Congress of the United States.

Universal consent has applied the maxims of this law to the protection of all our State and Federal courts, and why should it be denied to this House? What are we, said Mr. M., and how acting at this moment? As a court, of which you, sir, are the presiding and we the associate judges. The original of the British Parliament, the ancient Wittenagemotte, was a court, and one of its branches is the highest judicial tribunal in England. Both Houses of Congress have powers strictly judicial in their nature and application. If a Federal or State court, consisting of a single judge, is invested, by common-law construction, with authority to punish contempts of its authority and dignity, this assembly of judges may constitutionally exercise the same authority. That Constitution which confers on the representatives of the nation the power of legislation, and denominates this body a House of Representatives, clothes it with the common-law attributes appertaining to its office and its title.

Sir, said Mr. M., why this indignation against the common law? Our forefathers defended it, in the Old World, against Norman invasion, ecclesiastical fraud, and royal encroachment. They brought it hither; they planted it; and we have flourished beneath its shelter.

The common law! Had I the tongue of Henry, I would portray to you its excellence. He who implored the Convention of Virginia to reject this Constitution because it did not expressly adopt this law in all its maxims, the most eloquent champion that American liberty ever drew to her support, regarded this Constitution, which he had not tried, with suspicion, and the law under which he had lived with confidence and affection.

The doctrine which I advance, in relation to this Constitutional question, is congenial with the purest American feeling. The common law is that of the land which gave me birth. It is the law of every State of this widely extended Union. On its broad and solid basis rest the free constitutions of these States, as well as that noble structure which is committed to our care.

Sir, this law was not that of my remote progenitors. Erin's green turf, and the brown heath of Caledonia, although my eye never beheld them, are, I acknowledge, dear to my heart. This feeling is not inexplicable. Who is so base as to hear an insinuation against his father's name and not feel the life-blood mount to his cheek? Sir, this feeling binds us, not only to our ancestors, but to the land which gave them birth; it flows from the same fountain with that stronger sentiment which binds us to our own natal soil. It is not at war with the impulse of general benevolence, or callous to the merits of other nations. I can turn my eye across that channel along which my fancy has just conducted me, and exclaim in the language of the sweetest bard of Ireland—

"Gay, sprightly land of social mirth and ease, Pleased with thyself, whom all the world can please!"

H. OF R.

Case of Colonel Anderson.

JANUARY, 1818.

How altered is this scene ! Sir, the tear of pity must start from every eye at the sufferings of a misguided, much oppressed, but gallant nation.

Do we look for the monuments of our own history no farther back than the glorious era of '76 ? Are we ashamed of the achievements of our British ancestors, that we have begun to condemn their laws ? Who can speak or think of freedom without recollecting the names, of Locke, of Hampden, and of Sydney ?

Sir, I beg pardon for this digression. It was forced from me by the cloud which I thought I saw gathering on the brow of the House when I referred to the common law as the expositor of the American Constitution.

The colonists of Great Britain brought their laws with them to America. Their new lot was beset with difficulties and dangers. The savage lurked in his covert. The forest was to be opened to the light of cultivation. It was not a time, sir, to sit down in order to deliberate and to change their laws. Had they possessed the leisure, they had not the inclination, to innovate upon the established customs and usages of their forefathers. Those emigrants who united with them, from other countries, took the laws as they found them, and, if so inclined, they had not the power to change them.

These laws, and the habits of thinking, from which they sprung, and on which the laws themselves reacted, were incorporated with every political institution which they founded. The Parliament of England, and the courts of Westminster, were the models of their legislative assemblies, and of their judicial tribunals. Their constitution, their powers, their forms of proceeding, and their rules of decision, were sometimes prescribed by their laws, but generally left to implication, from the great fountain of practical wisdom—the common law of England.

I appeal to my colleagues, if this constitution had been formed contemporaneously with that of Virginia, would not the same power to punish contempts attach to the House of Representatives and Senate of the United States, as unquestionably belongs to the corresponding branches of the General Assembly, the House of Delegates and Senate of Virginia ? From the form of the Speaker's chair to the power of expelling a member, the character and authority of the House of Delegates is derived, without any express Constitutional provision, from the House of Commons, the archetype of the popular branch of every State Legislature, as it is of this House.

The force of the argument which this analogy furnishes, is not impaired by the consideration that the Federal Constitution is of more recent structure. It is the act of the people of the United States, as itself proclaims ; and, referring expressly to the common law, in one of its articles, unintelligible throughout, except by the aid of that law, we have a right to resort to its maxims in the present inquiry. If this power is essential to the House of Commons, so it must be presumed that the people of these States regarded it to be, and so must we consider it in relation to the two Houses of this Legislature.

It has been urged that many extravagant doctrines would arise from this source of constructive authority. Where, it is asked, shall this House stop in its use ? The Revolution of 1776 answers this question. It necessarily lopped off the regal and aristocratical branches of this law. This limitation of the common law relieves the rule of construction, for which I contend, from all that could alarm our fears. It is founded, I am inclined to believe, in judicial decisions throughout the United States. By the unanimous judgment of the General Court, the highest criminal tribunal of Virginia, the principle has been extended so far, as to authorize a defendant, indicted for a libel at common law, to give the truth in evidence. This House derives, therefore, from the common law, no privileges which it ought not to possess.

One of my colleagues has contended that all the privileges of this House are expressly enumerated by the sixth section of the first article of the Constitution, and restricted to exemption from arrest, in certain specified cases ; and from responsibility elsewhere for any speech or debate in the House. And hence, with great apparent plausibility, he infers that the House possesses no other privilege, and has authority to punish no other contempts, except such as are committed in violation of these. I answer to this argument, it has already been contended by the honorable member who last addressed the House, that this clause of the Constitution may be justly regarded as the result of that extreme caution which induced the convention to insert in it what might otherwise have been inferred ; a caution which is discernable in other parts of this instrument. To the illustration which he has furnished, many others may be added ; as, for example, the very first article of the amendments. The greater part of these are designed to serve the purpose of a bill of rights, for which so many opponents of the Constitution had most zealously contended. It cannot be presumed that if this amendment had not been made a part of the Constitution, Congress would have prohibited the free exercise of religion, have abridged the freedom of speech, or obstructed the right of the people peaceably to assemble and to petition for a redress of grievances. I am, however, led involuntarily to another explanation of the expediency of expressly incorporating in the Constitution the two privileges to which my colleague has referred ; an explanation, which is in strict harmony with all the views that I have taken of the general power of this House to punish contempts of its privileges. Every other privilege of this House, except those which are enumerated, will be found to be consistent with the obvious and equal rights of the people. The enumerated privileges are limitations of those rights, and, but for the express grant of them by the people, it might have been doubted whether the character of our republican institutions did not forbid their exercise. In fine, these enumerated privileges protect the members of this House, against the common and dearest rights of the citizen—the rights of property and reputation. The privileges for which I contend would protect the House from their injuries, from fraud, violence, and injustice.

Case of Colonel Anderson.

It cannot be justly inferred, therefore, that the enumeration of these privileges excludes the Constitutional exercise of all others. The Constitution which had sought to enumerate these, must have been satisfied with general terms of vague signification, or proceeded to an enumeration of particulars, which no Constitution ever did attempt to embrace. If it is admitted, and it seems to be generally conceded, that the House has power to punish contempts committed against its peace and dignity within this hall; then the object of the supposed enumeration totally fails, and with it this pretended limitation to the authority of the House, to punish contempts wherever they may be committed.

I will not unnecessarily consume the time of the House, in attempting to prove that an attempt to corrupt one of its members, while engaged in the discharge of his duties, is a contempt of its authority and dignity. The honorable member from Georgia, in an early stage of this debate, and the gentlemen who have since followed him, have completely occupied this ground; nor has it been contended by any of our opponents, that such would not be a contempt of the House of Commons. I hasten, therefore, to inquire, whether this House has proceeded legally in the arrest of the prisoner?

The honorable member from New Hampshire will, on examination, perceive that the warrant for the arrest is not, as he contended, a general warrant. It describes the prisoner by name. But it has been urged, with more apparent force, that it is unsustained by any oath or affirmation, and therefore is in violation of the fourth article of the amendments to the Constitution, which provides that no warrant shall issue but upon probable cause, supported by such evidence. The Constitution certainly supposes the judge who issues the warrant, not to be himself personally cognizant of the fact on which it is grounded. He may issue a warrant on "probable cause, supported by oath." It is certain, conviction of the truth of the fact must supersede the necessity of any oath, to say nothing of the absurdity to which such a doctrine might lead. A judge is assaulted and beat as he enters the court in which he is about to sit alone; will it be contended that he shall first make oath of the fact, and then issue his warrant for the apprehension of the offender? In this case the witness is a member of the House by whom the warrant is issued—a judge, in whose presence the alleged fact occurred. The warrant itself is issued on the signature of the Speaker, but by the order of the House, whose act it is, and therefore the act also of the member on whose information the warrant was issued.

Before I close my remarks, I cannot forbear noticing an observation of the honorable mover of the resolutions on your table, upon the precedents which have been so aptly and forcibly adduced, to sustain the authority of the House to punish the particular contempt which has given rise to this debate.

It has been contended, sir, that precedents are dangerous to liberty; that they favor the inroads of power upon the rights of the people. Such, I must confess, sir, is not my doctrine. It has been correctly said, by a profound judge and an able civilian, that the multiplicity of laws constitutes the security of the citizen. So, sir, does the multitude of precedents which, sanctioned by usage, operate with the force of law.

Precedents established in good times, stay, in disastrous days, the rage of faction, and the hand of tyranny—a Pharos erected on the margin of a stormy sea, by the light of which the mariner may anchor or steer his bark in safety.

The case of Randall, in 1796, to which the honorable member from Georgia called the attention of the House, forcibly as he has used it, was entitled to yet higher respect, from a consideration which had not occurred to him. The honorable member stated that it had arisen before the formation of parties in our public councils. He has certainly mistaken the history of the day. I was then but a boy, and am perhaps older than the honorable member. I may be allowed to remind him of facts which had an important bearing in support of this precedent. Does the honorable member recollect nothing of the controversy of the assumption of the State debts, the first Bank of the United States, the ratification of the British Treaty; nothing of the attempt to impeach Alexander Hamilton; nothing of those angry passions which in those days shook the Administration of WASHINGTON to its foundation? [Mr. FORSYTH explained. He referred, he said, to the division of the parties by their present names.]

Mr. M. proceeded: A member whispers to me, that they were called Federalists and anti-Federalists. This denomination, sir, was applied at an earlier day than that of which I now speak. The title of Democrats succeeded to that of anti-Federalists, and Republicans to this again. Yes, said Mr. M., the Federalists suffered themselves to be outwitted in yielding the popular title to their opponents—a prominent cause, I have no doubt, of their ultimate discomfiture.

I have not called the attention of the House to this topic, in order to revive unpleasant recollections, but for a more legitimate and useful purpose. Even in the times of party dissension and political animosity, 78 members voted in support of that authority of this House, which is now questioned, and 17 only against it; while the majority were equally divided between the two rival parties.

A precedent entitled to higher confidence could not be adduced. It is a precedent, too, directly in point; establishing not only the general authority of the House to punish contempts, but a contempt of the same species with that which has occasioned this debate.

Mr. ROBERTSON supported the resolutions.

Mr. ERVIN, of South Carolina, next rose. He said, after erudition had produced all its learning and eloquence to embellish the subject before the House, he rose to address it with considerable embarrassment; and his diffidence was increased by immediately succeeding an honorable gentleman (Mr. MERCER) who had given so great a display of talent. I am incapable of following him, said Mr. E., into the beautiful fields of imagination, where reason loses her powers of conviction, and where judgment must yield the sceptre of decision. It is alone the prerogative of genius to riot in the luxuries of fancy, and not only to investigate, but irradiate, all subjects presented to it for discussion. The task which I shall assign myself is more humble. I shall, in the cold and uninteresting terms of technical phraseology, endeavor to convince this honorable body that the resolutions ought to be adopted, and that it possesses no power to punish, unless in pursuance of some provision of law or constitution; and there being none, the defendant ought to be discharged. I shall vote his discharge with considerable reluctance. The insult he has offered to this honorable body is without palliation or excuse. We heard, said Mr. E., that in the late war his services were beneficial to his country. Our judgment, tempered with the honorable feelings of patriotism, passed a part of his accounts by a flattering majority. Not satisfied, he yet dared to insult the integrity of this House through the medium of the honorable chairman of the Committee of Claims, with the offer of a bribe.

The common law has been appealed to as the source from whence this House derives its power to punish in case of a breach of privilege. As a standard of construction, I admit the propriety of the appeal to enable us to ascertain the meaning of technical terms, derived from the common law, and which have been ingrafted into our Constitution. But as a rule of our conduct, and obligatory on our present decision, I deny the correctness of the application. For it must be recollected that the common law, which I admit is the wisdom of ages, is merely the municipal regulation of a foreign Power; and until it is made of force by the Constitution, which forms our rule of conduct, ought not to govern us.

I beg leave now, sir, to call your attention to what I conceive to be the privileges of the House, and the powers of the House to punish for a breach of those privileges. The first great power which it possesses is an inherent power of self-defence, analogous to the fundamental natural right which every man possesses of defending himself. It is in both cases merely defensive. The natural right results from man's relative situation in this state of existence. The duties which he owes to his God, his neighbor, and himself, beget, rather let me say, impose on him this power; nay, the obligation of self-defence is necessary to a complete discharge of those great duties. In like manner, every article in your Constitution which confides a trust or imposes an obligation to perform for the good of the people acts of legislation, creates and gives this power to enable you to perform those acts, and discharge, with due faith, the high trust which has been confided to you; and as, in the exercise of the natural right, a man is justified to make use of any force necessary to repel a personal injury; so, likewise, in the exercise of your inherent power, this House is justified to prevent or remove any annoyance within or without the walls of this House, which would tend to disturb its deliberations, or prevent it from the due performance of any of its duties. But, sir, you would not in either case be justified to make use of any force or restraint by way of punishment; for, in the case of the natural right, the use of any force, other than that which is necessary to overcome the offending force, would constitute an act of aggression. So, the exercise of force by the House, in the way of punishment, would not be justified by the inherent power, it being merely defensive. The exemption from arrest, and the privilege of not being questioned in any other place for any speech or debate in either House, constitute more of your privileges; for, although they tend to promote the immediate benefit of members in their individual capacity, they are yet the privileges of the House; and the House can, in both cases, punish any member who should waive his privilege without their consent.

These, sir, are, in my estimation, the legitimate and Constitutional privileges of Congress; and yet, sir, for the want of legal provision, they may with impunity be trampled on and set at defiance, not only by the defendant at your bar, but by any man in this great community. Is it correct, sir, to say that this inherent right extends beyond the limits which I have assigned it? That, by virtue of our election, we are politically amalgamated, and that the reception of an insult on the shores of the Atlantic would tremble along the sympathetic line, and agonize your feelings beyond the mountains? No, sir; I contend that out of the boundaries of this District we have no protection, no privilege, except those granted by the first article of the sixth section of the Constitution, other than the protection of other great and good men—that of virtue, and the privilege of convicting falsehood with truth, and confounding guilt by innocence. Mr. Speaker, behold the delicacy of our situation! A man arraigned at your bar for a most atrocious insult, and yet we have not the power to punish him. Although armed with plenary sovereignty, and the exclusive powers of legislation in all cases whatever in this District; although invested with authority to make all laws which may be necessary and proper to carry into execution all our powers, and to punish the breach of any of our privileges, yet we suffer these powers to slumber in criminal repose. As we pass along the streets, scorn may point the finger of contempt at us, defamations may teem from the press, arraigning the correctness of our conduct, and impeaching the purity of our intentions; nay, impudence and insolence may beard us at the very threshold of the great council of the nation, and without the provisions of law we cannot punish. Much has been said, sir, about State Legislatures, the judges of the United States, and State judges, possessing the power of punishing for contempt. I can speak with confidence in relation to this power in the State which I have the honor of representing. There, the Legislature, the judges, and even the justices of the peace, possess this power, not by arbitrary assumption, but by the provisions of the constitution and the principles of the common law, made of force in that State by an act of the colonial government, and which act is recognised and continued in force by a provision in the constitution of that State. In relation to the judges of the courts of the United States, we all know that they derive their power from an act of Congress which recognises the principles of the common law. And I think, upon inquiry, it will be ascertained that the Legislatures and judges of the several States possess this power by some provision in their laws or constitutions. Numerous precedents have been appealed to. I shall not suffer my mind, sir, to be governed, nay, influenced, by any precedents which, in my judgment, sanction error. It is, moreover, contended that, admitting there is no express provision in the Constitution which gives, without the aid of legislation, a power to punish in case of a breach of privilege, yet that this House, on account of the difficulty of annexing a punishment adequate to every breach of privilege, does possess a discretionary power ex necessitate rei. Mr. Speaker, it is no compliment to say that I would as lief trust this dangerous power in the possession of this honorable body as in any other known to our institutions; for in every case in which corruption has dared to approach you with its impurity, or raise its detestable glance to the elevation of your virtues, you have uniformly repelled it with indignant contempt. But, sir, I am unwilling to trust this power with any man or body of men. The time may come when our political virtue may have passed away; when corruption may have sapped the foundation of our boasted institutions; when the independence of this House may be lost, and seen bowing, with sycophantic smiles, at the shrine of Executive favor; nay, sir, when the very exertion of the physical force of the people will but operate to their own destruction. It is on these accounts that I wish all our proceedings may be sanctioned by law and Constitution. I feel a desire that gentlemen who advocate this power would pause a moment, and analyze its character. It is plenary sovereignty, armed with powers legislative, judicial, and executive. It is a power capable of passing laws ex post facto; of declaring that act criminal, ex re nata, which before was innocent. It is a power unknown and undefined, which lies dormant until, in a moment of angry feeling, it proclaims its laws, which are carried into execution by infuriated justice. Odi-ous tyranny! Most frightful despotism! More terrible than the laws of Caligula, or the rescript of the Roman Emperors.

Amelia Island.

H. OF R.

Mr. Speaker, at the pedestal of your seat I swore that I would defend the Constitution of my country. I will defend it, sir. But I sit here in a two-fold capacity—not only to defend the Constitution, but to protect the rights of the people; and as long as I have the honor of a seat on this floor, I will never sit in silence, and see their rights illegally invaded. In legal contemplation, the poorest man lies intrenched behind the rampart of laws; nay, clothed in the garb of plebeian humility, sits enthroned on the altar of liberty; and the power which can, without law, drag him from this sanctuary to punishment, destroys all idea of criminality, and makes him a sacrifice.

I tender my grateful acknowledgments to this House for the attention with which it has honored me.

When Mr. ERVIN concluded, on motion of Mr. HOLMES of Massachusetts, the House adjourned at past 4 o'clock, without having come to any decision on the question before them.

SATURDAY, January 10.

The SPEAKER laid before the House a letter, directed to the Congress of the United States, from a certain Carl Theodore Mohr, residing in Wal-lendorf, Germany, offering to come to America upon certain conditions, and to establish a manufactory of porcelain; which was ordered to lie on the table.

On motion of Mr. SERGEANT, the Committee of Ways and Means were instructed to inquire into the expediency of allowing a drawback upon refined sugar exported from the United States.

AMELIA ISLAND.

Mr. MIDDLETON, from the committee on so much of the Message of the President of the United States as relates to the illicit introduction of slaves from Amelia Island into the United States, made the following report:

The committee to whom was referred so much of the President's Message as relates to the illicit introduction of slaves from Amelia Island, having carefully taken the matter committed to them into consideration, respectfully report:

That having applied to the Department of State for information respecting the illicit introduction of slaves into the United States, they were referred by the Secretary of State to the documents transmitted to this House by the President's Message of the 15th December last, consisting of various extracts of papers on the files of the Departments of State, of the Treasury, and of the Navy, relative to the proceedings of certain persons who took possession of Amelia Island in the Summer of the past year, and also relative to a similar establishment previously made at Galveston near the mouth of the river Trinity.

Upon a full investigation of these papers, with a view to the subject committed to them, your committee are of opinion, that it is but too notorious, that numerous infractions of the law prohibiting the importation of slaves into the United States have been perpetrated with impunity upon our Southern frontier; and they are further of opinion, that similar infractions would have been repeated with increasing activity, without the timely interposition of the naval force under direction of the Executive of our Government. In the course of the investigation, your committee have found it difficult to keep separate the special matter given into their charge, from topics of a more general nature, which are necessarily interwoven therewith; they therefore crave the indulgence of the House, while they present some general views, connected with the subject, which have developed themselves in the prosecution of their inquiry.

It would appear from what had been collected from these papers, that numerous violations of our laws have been latterly committed by a combination of freebooters and smugglers of various nations, who located themselves in the first instance upon an uninhabited spot near the mouth of the river Trinity, within the jurisdictional limits of the United States, as claimed in virtue of the treaty of cession of Louisiana by France. This association of persons organized a system of plunder upon the high seas, directed chiefly against Spanish property, which consisted frequently of slaves from the coast of Africa; but their conduct appears not always to have been regulated by a strict regard to the national character of vessels falling into their hands, when specie or other very valuable articles formed part of the cargo. Their vessels generally sailed under a pretended Mexican flag, although it does not appear that the establishment of Galveston was sanctioned by or connected with any Government. The presumption, too, of any authority ever having been given for such an establishment, is strongly repelled as well by its piratical character, as by its itinerant nature; for the first position, at Galveston, was abandoned on or about the 5th of April last, for one near Matagorda, upon the Spanish territory; and at a later period this last was abandoned and a transfer made to Amelia Island, in East Florida; a post which had been previously seized by persons, who appear to have been equally unauthorized, and who were, at the time of the said transfer, upon the point, it is believed, of abandoning their enterprise, from the failure of resources, which they expected to have drawn from within our limits, in defiance of our laws. There exists, on the part of these sea-rovers, an organized system of daring enterprise, supported by force of arms; and it is only by a correspondent system of coercion that they can be met and constrained to respect the rights of property and the laws of nations. It is deeply to be regretted that practices of such a character, within our immediate neighborhood, and even within our jurisdictional limits, should have prevailed unchecked for so long a time; more especially, as one of their immediate consequences was to give occasion to the illicit introduction of slaves from the coast of Africa into these United States, and thus to revive a traffic repugnant to humanity and to all sound principles of policy, as well as severely punishable by the laws of the land.

By the 7th section of the act prohibiting the importation of slaves, passed in 1807, the President is fully authorized to employ the naval force to cruise on any part of the coast of the United States, or territories thereof, where he may judge attempts will be made to violate the provisions of that act, in order to seize and bring in for condemnation all vessels contravening its provisions, to be proceeded against according to law.

By the joint resolution of the Senate and House of Representatives of 15th January, 1811, and the act of the same date, the President is fully empowered to occupy any part or the whole of the territory lying east of the river Perdido, and south of the State of Georgia, in the event of an attempt to occupy the said territory, or any part thereof by any foreign Government or Power; and, by the same resolution and act, he may employ any part of the Army and Navy of the United States, which he may deem necessary, for the purpose of taking possession and occupying the territory aforesaid, and in order to maintain therein the authority of the United States.

Among the avowed projects of the persons who have occupied Amelia Island, was that of making the conquest of East and West Florida, professedly for the purpose of establishing there an independent government; and the vacant lands in those provinces have been, from the origin of this undertaking down to the latest period, held out as lures to the cupidity of adventurers, and as resources for defraying the expenses of the expedition. The greater part of West Florida being in the actual possession of the United States, this project involved in it designs of direct hostility against them; and as the express object of the resolution and act of 15th January, 1811, was to authorize the President to prevent the province of East Florida from passing into the hands of any foreign Power, it became the obvious duty of the President to exercise the authority vested in him by that law. It does not appear that among these itinerant establishments of republics, and distributors of Florida lands, there is a single individual inhabitant of the country where the republic was to be constituted, and whose lands were to be thus bestowed; the project was, therefore, an attempt to occupy that territory by a foreign Power. Where the profession is in such direct opposition to the fact; where the venerable forms, by which a free people constitute a frame of government for themselves, are prostituted by a horde of foreign freebooters for purposes of plunder; if, under color of authority from any of the provinces contending for their independence, the Floridas, or either of them, had been permitted to pass into the hands of such a Power, the committee are persuaded it is quite unnecessary to point out to the discernment of the House the pernicious influence which such a destiny of the territories in question must have had upon the security, tranquillity, and commerce of this nation.

It is a matter of public notoriety, that two of the persons who have successively held the command at Amelia Island, whether authorized themselves by any Government or not, have issued commissions for privateers, as in the name of the Venezuelan and Mexican Governments, to vessels fitted out in the ports of the United States, and chiefly manned and officered by our own countrymen, for the purpose of capturing the property of nations with which the United States are at peace. One of the objects of the occupation of Amelia Island, it appears, was to possess a convenient resort for privateers of this description, equally reprobated by the laws of nations, which recognise them only under the denomination of pirates, and by several of the treaties of the United States with different European Powers, which expressly denominate them as such.* It was against the subjects of Spain, one of the Powers with which the United States have entered into stipulations prohibiting their citizens from taking any commission from any Power with which she may be at war for arming any ships to act as privateers, that these vessels have been commissioned to cruise; though, as the committee have observed, no flag, not even that of our own country, has proved a protection from them. The immediate tendency of suffering such armaments, in defence of our laws, would have been to embroil the United States with all the nations whose commerce with our country was suffering under these depredations; and, if not checked by all the means in the power of the Government, would have authorized claims from the subjects of foreign Governments for indemnities, at the expense of this nation, for captures by our people, in vessels fitted out in our ports, and, as could not fail of being alleged, countenanced by the very neglect of the necessary means for suppressing them. The possession of Amelia Island as a port of refuge for such privateers, and of illicit traffic in the United States of their prizes, which were frequently, as before stated, slave ships from Africa, was a powerful encouragement and temptation to multiply these violations of our laws, and made it the duty of the Government to use all the means in its power to restore the security of our own commerce, and of that of friendly nations upon our coasts, which could in no other way more effectually be done than by taking from this piratical and smuggling combination their place of refuge.

In order, therefore, to give full effect to the intentions of the Legislature, and in pursuance of the provisions of the above recited resolution and acts, it became necessary (as it appears to your committee) to suppress all establishments of the hostile nature of those above described, made in our vicinity, the objects of which appear to have been the occupation of the Floridas, the spoliation of peaceful commerce upon and near our coasts by piratical privateers, the clandestine importation of goods, and the illicit introduction of slaves within our limits. Such establishments, if suffered to subsist and strengthen, would probably have rendered nugatory all provisions made by law for the exclusion of prohibited persons. The course pursued on this occasion will strongly mark the feelings and intentions of our Government upon the great question of the slave trade, which is so justly considered by most civilized nations as repugnant to justice and humanity, and which, in our particular case, is not less so to all the dictates of a sound policy.

Your committee anticipate beneficial results from the adoption of these measures by the Executive, in the promotion of the security of our Southern frontier and its neighboring seas, and in the diminution of the evasions, latterly so frequent, of our revenue and prohibitory laws. The experience of ten years has, however, evinced the necessity of some new regulations being adopted in order effectually to put a stop to the farther introduction of slaves into the United States. In the act of Congress prohibiting this importation, the policy of giving the whole forfeiture of vessel and goods to the United States, and no part thereof to the informer, may justly be doubted. This is an oversight which should be remedied. The act does indeed give a part of the personal penalties to the informer, but these penalties are generally only nominal. As the persons engaged in such traffic are usually poor, the omission of the States to pass acts to meet the act of Congress, and to establish regulations in aid of the same, can only be remedied by Congress legislating directly on the subject themselves, as it is clearly within the scope of their Constitutional powers to do. For these purposes your committee beg leave respectfully herewith to report a bill.

Mr. MIDDLETON then reported a bill in addition to the former acts prohibiting the introduction of slaves into the United States; and the bill was twice read, and committed.

The report was not read, but ordered to be printed.

COLONEL ANDERSON'S CASE.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the following letter and enclosure, yesterday received by him from John Anderson:

JANUARY 9, 1818.

SIR: Unwilling to be deprived, by any circumstances whatever, of an opportunity to explain to the honorable House of Representatives the motives which have actuated my recent conduct, I beg leave to announce my wish to waive, with that object, any Constitutional or other question which may have arisen.

I enclose a letter which I had the honor this morning to prepare for the consideration of the House.

I am, sir, with profound respect,

JOHN ANDERSON.

HON. HENRY CLAY,

Speaker of the House of Reps.

WASHINGTON, Jan. 9, 1818.

SIR: Considering the honorable body before whose bar I am shortly to appear as the guardian of those rights which, as a citizen, I possess, and relying upon the generous feelings of its members, I have been induced to forego the privilege extended to me of employing counsel, lest it might be supposed that I was inclined to shelter myself by legal exceptions. As the novelty of my situation may, however, tend to surround me with embarrassment, it is my wish, should the rule of proceeding adopted by the House not oppose the course, that such questions as I have reduced to writing, be propounded to the respective witnesses by the Clerk, and that he should read the explanation and apology which I have to make.

JOHN ANDERSON.

HON. HENRY CLAY,

Speaker of the House of Reps.

The letter having been read—

Mr. FORSYTH rose to move that these resolutions be laid on the table. We owe it, said Mr. F., to our own dignity, to the dignity of the members of this House, that the investigation of the offence of John Anderson should proceed. The inquiry which has arisen into the extent of the privileges and powers of the House may be resumed afterwards, and decided. But let us see, said he, what will be the consequence of our proceeding in the present course, and being diverted by this inquiry from the examination of the accused. A person offers a bribe to a member of this House, the House orders the offender into custody—the letter of the accused, which is the foundation and the evidence of the charge, refers to certain officers of the Government, and members of this House, as prepared to support the claims to which he alludes. Instead of calling this person before us, and seeing how far we can substantiate the charge, the proceeding is stopped, by the resolutions before us, and the protracted debate which follows. May not this course, said Mr. F., put a strange construction on the matter? Malicious persons may say, and there are many such, it is the intention of the House to stifle a dangerous inquiry, not to settle an important Constitutional question. To avoid any possibility of such an imputation, let us, said Mr. F., suspend the consideration of these resolutions, and proceed in the examination of the accused.

Mr. PITKIN observed, that the object of the resolutions was, to turn the accused over to the Executive officers; if they pass, the United States Attorney would be directed to prosecute him. But why not, before this, said Mr. P., bring the accused before us, and hear his explanation on the subject? An additional reason for this course, Mr. P. thought, was the request of the accused to come before the House. After examining and hearing him, Mr. P. said, the House could decide whether they ought to pass the resolutions, and turn him over to another tribunal.

Mr. SPENCER said, the remarks of Mr. PITKIN applied only to the second resolution, and not to the first; and he hoped the motion would not be agreed to. He did not, he said, possess such a feeling of dignity as to do, or persevere in anything which he thought improper; and in the conscientious discharge of his duty he should never look beyond the walls of the House for his motives. In this case, however, said he, malice itself could not impeach the motives of the House; for a proposition to direct the officers of the United States to proceed against the accused, could not, by any ingenuity, be construed into a disposition to stifle the inquiry. He therefore hoped the House would proceed and determine the abstract principle, without any reference to the merits of the case, and without considering whether John Anderson can make an acceptable apology or not.

Mr. HARRISON was in favor of laying the resolutions on the table, and proceeding immediately to the examination of the accused. It was not to be supposed that, because he was one of those referred to by John Anderson, as willing to support his claims, that he felt the slightest wish to avoid an examination of that individual. Mr. H. said, so far from disclaiming a readiness to support the claims of which Anderson is the agent, he felt bound in the strongest manner to aid them. Independently of a conviction of their justice, Mr. H. said, those claims came from a people and a Territory for which he felt a peculiar interest. He was therefore unconscious of any appearance of impropriety in being included among those whom the accused named as disposed to aid in his suit before the House.

Mr. FORSYTH replied to Mr. SPENCER, that all must know the extent of human malignity. Every one acquainted with our political history must, he said, be sensible how far the motives and the conduct of this House may be questioned and misrepresented; and he knew that the ingenuity of malice was such that it could, and probably would, impute false and impure motives to the course which the House was pursuing; and his object was, by going at once into an investigation of the matter, to leave no pretext whatever for a misconstruction of the conduct of the House. The gentleman admitted there was no law under which the person accused could be indicted; to refer him to the Attorney General or District Attorney then was idle; we know no investigation can take place.

Mr. HOPKINSON was unfriendly to the motion to lay the resolutions on the table. After all, it was a mere question of order in the proceeding; but, he said, as the question had already been discussed much at large, and as it must be decided in the end, he thought it was better to do so now, after having gone so far into it, than afterwards to have all that has been done to go over again. At any rate, Mr. H. hoped the House would not abandon the question without bringing it to a decision. A strong reason for prosecuting the inquiry now before the House was, Mr. H. said, that a majority of the gentlemen who delivered their sentiments were on one side; and those on the other side, he said, ought to have an opportunity of submitting also their views of it. He had no idea that the House wished to shrink from an investigation of the latter, whatever appearance it might have, or might be given to it.

Mr. POINDESTER said, that although he denied the power of the House to punish the individual who had been arrested under the warrant of the Speaker, and whose case was under consideration, he should vote to lay the resolutions offered by Mr. SPENCER on the table. The letter addressed by the accused to the Speaker, which had been read for the information of the House, proposes, on his part, submission to the authority of the House, with a view to explanations and apologies, which he says he is prepared to make. I am willing, said Mr. P., to afford him this opportunity. If the House should be satisfied, after hearing the excuse which may be made by the accused, for his extraordinary conduct, or the apology which he may offer in mitigation of the offence, we shall be enabled to waive for the present a decision of the great Constitutional question which has been raised on this occasion, and which is calculated to embarrass the proceedings, and occupy much of the time of this body. With a hope that this might be the result of the proposed explanation, and that suitable provision may be made by law for similar cases, should they hereafter occur, and thereby remove the embarrassment which we experience in the case now under consideration, Mr. P. said, he should support the motion to lay the resolutions on the table.

Mr. DESHA was in favor of laying the resolutions on the table. John Anderson prayed to be heard; and if we find, said Mr. D., that he can exonerate himself from the offence, I wish it to be done; because this debate may continue yet many days, all which time the accused must remain in custody, if not heard before. After his examination the discussion can be resumed, and the question settled.

JANUARY, 1818.

Case of Colonel Anderson.

H. OF R.

Mr. RICH inquired whether the accused had expressed a wish to be heard at once. If so, Mr. R. was willing to lay the resolutions on the table, and hear him; but, if not, he was opposed to the motion.

Mr. BEECHER remarked, that one reason with him for not wishing to lay the resolutions on the table was, that he had no idea of receiving a petition from a man who was held in custody. Mr. B. was not disposed to hold the accused in custody a moment longer than he had the right; but he was in favor of first trying if the House possess that right or not. I am not willing, said Mr. B., to get rid of this question by permitting the party to come in here, and give evidence against himself, or by allowing him to come forward and admit our jurisdiction in the case.

Mr. PINDALL made a few remarks in coincidence with those of Mr. POINDEXTER, of which he expressed his approbation.

The motion to lay the resolutions on the table was decided in the negative—ayes about 30; and the question then recurred on the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. POINDEXTER, of Mississippi, then rose. He said that the importance of the Constitutional question involved in the question under consideration, he trusted would afford him a satisfactory apology to the House for the time which he might occupy in delivering his opinions in relation to it. He regretted that the investigation which he had been enabled to give this case did not justify him in proceeding to pass judgment on the accused (John Anderson) for the offensive and highly indecorous letter which he had addressed to an honorable member of this body. Sir, said Mr. P., no gentleman can feel with more sensibility than myself the nefarious and insulting offer which was made by this man to the honorable member from North Carolina, (Mr. WILLIAMS,) and, through him, the indignity offered to this House, by an attempt so corrupt in its inception, and so futile in its result. Such criminal and unwarrantable conduct deserves the severest punishment which the laws of the country would sanction, and the reprobation which it would doubtless receive of every good man in society. But, said Mr. P., I am called on, in the character of a judge, to determine the nature of this offence, to apply the law which governs it, and to estimate the degree of punishment which its magnitude demands. In the discharge of these high and responsible duties, it is incumbent on me to examine, with care and attention, the powers which I am to exercise, and the sources from which my authority is derived. If I am satisfied on these points, I shall feel justified in taking cognizance of the case, and, by applying the law to the evidence, render such a decision as shall preserve the Constitutional privileges of the honorable body to which I belong, without in any manner violating the sacred rights secured to the meanest citizen, and of which he cannot be deprived, so long as our political institutions shall remain unimpaired. But, sir, while I am disposed to guard with becoming zeal our own privileges, and to give a liberal construction to the Constitution, in relation to the power which we may possess to suppress every attempt to disturb our legislative proceedings, I am bound to respect the rights of the people, and to protect them also from oppression, in the exercise on our part of arbitrary, undefined discretion. I admit the principle which has been contended for by some gentlemen, in the course of the debate, that every tribunal, whether it be legislative or judicial, possesses inherently and of necessity the power to protect itself from interruption in the discharge of the duties assigned to it by the Constitution. Without this authority, there would be an end of legislation, and courts of justice would become contemptible and ridiculous. If one or more individuals, within the walls of the House, while we are in session, deliberating on the important subjects which are submitted to us, as one branch of the National Legislature, should, by unusual and unnecessary noises, or by insulting expressions or conduct, interrupt the calm, dignified, and deliberate proceedings of this body, I should consider the removal of such disorderly persons, and their subsequent confinement, so as to prevent a repetition of the offence, a right necessarily appertaining to this and every other deliberative assembly. So if by the firing of guns, beating drums, throwing stones at the windows, or any other violent means, we are disturbed while in the exercise of our Constitutional functions, the same principle of self-protection which applies to every independent department of the Government, and which is inseparable from its very existence, would justify the arrest and confinement of the offenders. I will apply the same principle to every act which disables a member, so that he is rendered incapable of discharging his ordinary duties in the House, as a Representative of a portion of the American people. Taking these premises as the reasonable limitation of the separate authority of either House of Congress to punish contempts, permit me to ask gentlemen who would extend that authority to cases occurring in the recess of the Legislature, whether they would consider an unusual noise in the gallery, or the firing of guns, or other tumultuous conduct around the building in which we sit, after an adjournment, a contempt of the House, and, on the succeeding day, proceed to arrest the persons concerned, and punish them by imprisonment? I cannot believe that any honorable gentleman would push this doctrine to such extremities; and, to my mind, the conclusion is irresistible, that no act, however offensive, can be construed into a contempt of this body, which does not directly interfere with and disturb its deliberations while in session, or disable some one of its members, so that he cannot discharge the trust reposed in him by his constituents. Suppose, sir, a challenge should be delivered to a member of this House, at his lodgings—suppose it should even menace personal chastisement—and, in the event of a refusal on the part of the member to meet his antagonist, he should be published to the world as a man destitute of honor, of integrity, and of personal courage; would you send your Sergeant-at-Arms with a warrant, and sentence the citizen who had thus insulted the feelings of a Representative to the confines of a loathsome jail? Or would it not comport more with our dignity, and a proper respect for the laws of our country, to refer the subject to the ordinary courts of justice, whose province it is to try and punish offenders of this description? To me it appears evident that the latter alternative would invariably be adopted. For, although the feelings of the member might be grossly insulted, the business of the House would not thereby be disturbed or impeded. In considering the doctrine of contempts, it may be useful to inquire what would amount to a contempt of a judge while in the discharge of his judicial duties. I presume it will not be contended, that, in this particular, we have a power paramount to the courts established under the Constitution. If a man in open court pronounce the judge on the bench to be a scoundrel, or impute to him partiality in his decisions, or use any other insulting language, he is guilty of a contempt, and the court may immediately proceed to fine and imprison him. Again, if a man in open court places on the bench a libellous or insulting letter, offering a bribe, or charging the judge with partiality in his official character, or interrupts the order and decorum so essential to a correct administration of justice, he would be guilty of a contempt, and liable to punishment in a summary way. But the same conduct in the recess of the court would not be considered a contempt, according to any principle or practice with which I am acquainted. The publication of a libel on the character of a judge, or a charge of partiality in his decisions, addressed to him in a private letter, at a time when he is not in the discharge of his judicial duties, are offences punishable only by indictment, in the same manner as if the libellous matter had been written or published of a private person. I apply the same rule to the Representatives of the people, and would adopt the same remedies, under similar circumstances. What then, Mr. Speaker, is the fact on which we are to adjudge John Anderson guilty of a contempt of this House? It is single, and admits of no ambiguity. This man, during an adjournment of the House, and at the private room of the honorable gentleman from North Carolina, handed to him a letter highly criminal and insulting, containing an offer of a bribe for services to be performed in his legislative capacity. I ask, sir, if this act interferes with or disturbs our deliberations on this floor? Certainly not. It was a vain, foolish, and wicked effort to mislead the judgment of an honorable gentleman, by pecuniary temptations and rewards. It was spurned with indignation, and the purity of this body remains uncontaminated.

The crime which this man has committed ought not to pass unpunished; but to me it does not appear to fall within the definition of a contempt, and, therefore, cannot form an exception to any other crime of which the courts of justice alone have jurisdiction. But it is said that the letter which constitutes the basis of these proceedings is a breach of privilege; and reference has been had to parliamentary law in support of this opinion. Sir, I beg gentlemen to reflect for a moment, before they recognise all the absurdities which are to be found in precedents drawn from the British House of Commons. Besides the catalogue of exemptions so emphatically exposed by the honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. BARBOUR,) many others, equally repugnant to the principles of a free constitution, are to be found in the records of the House of Commons; extending, under the vague, undefined, and unlimited doctrine of privilege, protection, from arrests in civil cases, to the wife, the servants, and other domestics of a member. Their goods cannot be seized in execution, and even on a judgment rendered before the commencement of the privilege. Nor are they bound to obey a summons to give evidence in a court of justice. A British subject was, in a case which I find reported, imprisoned five days for striking the servant of a member of Parliament. Are gentlemen prepared to adopt these exclusive privileges, and apply them as they may find it necessary to the representatives of a free people? I cannot believe that any honorable member within these walls would desire to stand in a circle of exemptions and immunities so abhorrent to every principle of free government. What, sir! will it be contended that not only the person, the feelings, and the purity, if you please, of a Representative, shall be held sacred, but that his servant also is entitled to more than ordinary respect from the multitude? and by the strong arm of power, this House will inflict, at its own discretion, suitable punishment on him who dares to infringe the rights of this privileged class! The master, servants, and retinue, all come within the wide scope of the broad jurisdiction exercised by the British House of Commons in cases of this nature. But we are told that reason and common sense are to govern our decisions, and not the law of Parliament, in extenso. I should be thankful to any gentleman who would designate, with precision, the point at which we are to stop in reference to British precedents; if we admit their application in one case, why deny it in another? There the law of privilege is undefined, and so, we are informed, it is here, and so it must remain, because, say its advocates, it would be impossible to enumerate all the cases which might require the interposition of this House, in the protection of its members. If, then, the law in both countries is unbounded in its extent and application, the practice must correspond in all its ramifications, or be altogether disregarded. We must build up a system of our own, founded on reason and common sense. Sir, these favorite expressions may mean one thing to-day and another to-morrow; they mean anything to suit the necessity of the case to which they are applied. I deny, in their whole extent, the validity of parliamentary precedents; I discard them from my mind in deliberating on the question now before the House; I take as the rule of my conduct the Constitution and laws of my own country, and the constructions given to them since the establishment of this Government. Having endeavored to show, I trust satisfactorily, that the act of writing and delivering a libellous or insulting letter to a judge in the recess of a court, or to a member of either House of Congress, when not in session, could not be deemed a contempt, or a breach of privilege, I shall proceed to investigate the authority of this House to arraign, try, and punish, an individual for a crime which cannot be distinguished from the general class of the indictable offences cognizable in the ordinary courts of judicature. From whence, sir, do we derive the power to proceed in the case under consideration? Are we to look for it in the code of common law, which has been called by an honorable gentleman from Virginia (Mr. MERCER) the bulwark of our liberties; or is it to be found in the statutes passed by Congress; or in some provision of the Constitution, either express or implied? With regard to the common law, on the excellence of which that honorable gentleman has so eloquently descanted, I totally deny its existence in the United States, as a nation. The sages and patriots who laid the foundation of this Government, have carefully avoided its adoption; and the courts have never assumed jurisdiction, more especially in criminal cases, which is not expressly given in the Constitution or the laws made in pursuance thereof.

On this subject I hope I shall be pardoned, for referring to the opinion of a judge, than whom none more enlightened has sat on the bench of the Supreme Court of the Union; (I allude to the late Judge Chase.) Mr. P. then stated the substance of the case as follows: Robert Warrall was indicted at common law, in the district court of Pennsylvania, for having written a letter to Tench Coxe, Commissioner of the Revenue, making proposition for a contract for the building of a light-house, and offering to Mr. Coxe seven hundred pounds, if he accepted the terms proposed. The jury returned a verdict of guilty, and a motion was made in arrest of judgment. On this motion Judge Chase delivered an opinion, from which I will proceed to read one or two sentences, as applying to the point in discussion. "This is an offence highly injurious to morals, and deserving the severest punishment; but, as it is an indictment at common law, I dismiss at once everything which has been said about the Constitution and laws of the United States. In this country every man sustains a two-fold political capacity; one in relation to the State, and another in relation to the United States. In relation to the State, he is subject to various municipal regulations, founded upon the State constitution and policy, which do not affect him in his relation to the United States. For the Constitution of the Union is the source of all the jurisdiction of the National Government; so that the Departments of the Government can never assume any power that is not expressly granted by that instrument, nor exercise a power in any other manner than is there prescribed." The strict analogy between that case and the one now under consideration, must be obvious to every gentleman; and the principle of the decision is to my mind conclusive and unanswerable. It has, on several occasions, received the sanction of the Supreme Court, and may now be considered as a settled law. I imagine the gentleman from Virginia would find it a difficult task to tell us what that common law is, on which he has pronounced his eloquent eulogium. Is it, sir, the common law of New Hampshire, of Massachusetts, of New York, of Virginia, of Kentucky; or is it that incongruous system of common law of England, which is fraught with so many absurdities? The most valuable principles of which are drawn from the civil law, with the single exception of the right of trial by jury. Will the gentleman have the goodness to put his finger on the code he so highly recommends? I presume the attempt to do so would lead him into perplexities, from which he would be glad to escape by yielding the pursuit. The United States can have no common law as a nation; and this arises from the limitations within which the National Government is confined by the written constitution which put it into existence. If then we cannot resort to that widely diffused and fruitful source of power, to justify the proceeding against the accused in this case—and for one I protest against the establishment of a precedent, so dangerous in its tendency, and so uncertain in its extent and application—let us examine the statutes of our own country, and ascertain whether they contain any provision which confers the right claimed by the advocates of this measure.

The simple declaration, that the statute can be found which, in the remotest degree, gives jurisdiction to either branch of the National Legislature over any crime, whatever may be its dignity, (the case of impeachment excepted,) is sufficient to put this part of the subject at rest. No, sir; our laws have not been violated; nor is there any clause in the Constitution which either expressly, or by fair implication, contains the grant of power which the House is called upon to assume. What are the privileges secured to us in that instrument?

"Article 3, section 6. They (Senators and Representatives) shall, in all cases except treason, felony, and breach of the peace, be privileged from arrest, during their attendance at the session of their respective Houses, and in going to and returning from the same; and, for any speech or debate in either House, they shall not be questioned in any other place."

Are gentlemen prepared to overleap the barriers of the Constitution, and take shelter under the practice of the British House of Commons? To adopt the law of privilege and prerogative, so hateful to the principles and feelings of a free people? To what purpose are the powers of Congress limited, by a solemn written charter, if those thus intended to be restrained can at pleasure transcend the limits prescribed? Sir, I fear the precedent which we are about to establish in this case, under the influence of excited sensibility, will, in my humble conception, prostrate the very salutary guards placed by the wisdom of our fathers around the temple of liberty. The cause of John Anderson, humbled and degraded as he has rendered himself by his own criminal conduct, is the cause of my constituents, and of every man in the nation. The encroachments of power never yield; they must be resisted in their inception, or, by slow degrees, they steal upon the rights of the citizen, until resistance will be vain and nugatory. No man in this country can be punished, who has not infringed some known law, recognised and promulgated prior to the offence; nor in any other manner than according to forms pointed out in the Constitution, or the laws made in pursuance thereof. A departure from this rule leads directly to the very door of despotism. The will of the despot decides both the law and the measure of punishment, guided only by his own discretion, and what may appear to be the necessity of the case. But I trust, sir, we yet feel respect enough for personal liberty to acknowledge the supremacy of the laws, and where they have not been violated, we are bound to acquit. An act, innocent at the time it is committed, can never be made criminal by subsequent legislation. As well might you print the statutes in Greek, and hang them up so high that they cannot be read, as to punish an individual who has been guilty of no crime which contravenes the existing penal laws of the country. Yes, sir, I should consider my rights as well secured in the one case as in the other, and I would not give one cent to choose between them. But, to sustain the power of the House on this occasion, we are referred to the common law, to parliamentary law, and to the practice of Congress on similar occasions. Having disposed of the two first of these auxiliaries, as altogether inapplicable to and inconsistent with the principles of a free Government, I beg the indulgence of the House, while I retrospect on the precedents which have arisen since the adoption of the Federal Constitution. The case of Randall and Whitney is the only instance where a power analogous to that now claimed, has been exercised by the House of Representatives. That case was decided under very great excitement, and some of the most enlightened statesmen, then in Congress, voted against the measure. Since that period there is not, within my knowledge, a single case which recognises the authority of the House to punish offences which do not interfere with, or disturb, its deliberations. Mr. Randolph, of Va., was insulted, and even assaulted, in the theatre, at Philadelphia, for a speech which he had delivered on a proposition to reduce the Military Establishment of the United States. The outrage having been committed by a marine officer, holding his commission at the will of the President, and being a direct violation of one of the Constitutional privileges of a member of either House of Congress, Mr. Randolph made a written communication to Mr. Adams, then President of the United States, on the subject. The circumstance came before the House of Representatives, through an Executive Message; and, yet, they declined inflicting any punishment on the offender. In this case, the privilege violated was among those enumerated in the Constitution, and the attention of the House had been invited to it by the Chief Magistrate, as a fit subject for their animadversion. Notwithstanding these facts, the House, after much discussion, did not even reprimand the person charged with this infraction of their privileges.

The newspapers, in every part of the Union, bestow upon the two Houses of Congress, collectively and individually, the most unlimited abuse, menacing them with public indignation, for votes, either given, or to be given, on questions of great national importance; and yet, sir, we do not send the Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest and bring the editors before us to answer for these attempts to corrupt the fountain of legislation. And is it not equally culpable to induce a member to vote contrary to his own judgment by threats, as it would be to produce the same result by promises of reward and favor? The effect on public justice and morality is the same in either case, and it is against the evil consequences of such attempts which we are to guard. While on this subject, permit me, sir, to mention a case which must be within the recollection of many gentlemen on this floor. During the discussion which took place in the Senate on the renewal of the charter of the old Bank of the United States, the editor of a newspaper in Baltimore, whose name I do not distinctly remember, charged an honorable member of that body, now a citizen of Kentucky, with having received extraordinary accommodations at that bank, as a consideration for the vote which he had pledged himself to give in favor of a renewal of the charter. A gentleman from Georgia, then a member of the Senate, and now at the head of the Treasury Department, animadverted, with great force, on the unwarrantable conduct of the editor, who was, he said, at that time, in the gallery of the Senate, where he could not be without the invitation of a Senator. It is impossible to conceive of a more outrageous attack on the feelings and integrity of a member of any legislative body than the one to which I have referred. And, although the individual who made it was at that time within the walls of the House, the Senate, who were assuredly not ignorant of its powers, nor insensible to the insult offered to one of its members, took no step whatever with a view to the punishment of the editor; but, to show their indignation at a calumny so base and unfounded, they seized the first opportunity which presented itself, of electing the honorable member who had been thus calumniated to the Chair of the Senate. I would ask if it be not even more criminal to charge a Representative or Senator with having received a bribe for an important vote, than to offer a reward for extra services, in relation to the claims of private individuals? I do not pretend to justify the one, nor would I extenuate the other; but, if the purity of this body is to be preserved by its powers to punish every attempt on the integrity of its members, it ought to be extended from Louisiana to Massachusetts, and no vile printer who should dare to attribute an improper motive, or hold out inducements, to a member of this House, which might in any manner control his judgment, should go unpunished, so long as we can afford a Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest and bring him to the bar of the House.

Finding a variety of conflicting precedents, in relation to the practice of Congress, in this particular, I shall not feel myself bound to respect them on either side, but shall consider this as a case of the first impression. I will not consent to be governed by the laws and usages of Great Britain or of any other country, on a question touching the liberty of the citizen. I look into the Constitution and statute book of my own country for a definition of my rights, and those of the community at large. If the accused in this instance has been guilty of a crime, and that he has I cannot doubt, he is entitled to a fair and impartial trial by jury. By a reference to the sixth article of the amendments to the Constitution of the United States, we find "that in all criminal prosecutions, the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial, by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; and to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defence." Are we about to deprive this unfortunate man of these sacred rights; to immolate them on the altar of Congressional privileges, and thereby establish a precedent which may drag to the bar of some future Congress the most respectable citizen in the Union, who may become offensive to one of its members? Is there no other rights guaranteed to the people of the United States which interdict to this House the power to proceed in this case? "No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime, unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia when in actual service, in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offence to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, nor shall he be compelled in any criminal case to be witness against himself." Is there any indictment, or any presentment of a grand jury against the accused in this case? most certainly not. Will he not, if tried and punished by this House, be liable to an indictment or presentment of the grand jury of this District, and if found guilty to the like punishment, as if these extra judicial proceedings had not been taken? I imagine it will not be pretended that he could plead his conviction here, in bar of any subsequent prosecution. You exhibit to the world the solemn mockery of a judicial tribunal, possessing criminal jurisdiction, consisting of one hundred and seventy members. You bring to the bar of the House this poor man, John Anderson, who has offended against what you are pleased to call your privileges. He is compelled to answer such questions as the Speaker may ask him; "to be witness against himself." He is deprived of the right of trial by jury, and may be prosecuted and punished a second time for the same offence. And, in addition to all this, when you are asked to designate the law which the accused has violated, you refer him to the common law of England; to the law of Parliament, under the head of privileges; and, for your power, to reason and common sense. Sir, I have often heard, in courts of justice, the doctrine advanced, that ignorance of the law is no excuse for him who offends against its provisions; and the maxim is a salutary one, for it is the duty of every man to know the laws of his country; but we, in our wisdom, go one step farther, and require a man to answer for the violation of a law deposited in the bosoms of one hundred and seventy judges, and to receive such punishment as may be thought necessary to preserve the dignity and independence of those by whom the sentence is pronounced. But we have been told by an honorable gentleman from Virginia, (Mr. TUCKER,) that we possess all the powers necessary and proper for carrying into effect those expressly delegated in the Constitution, and that it is a power adherent in every legislative body to punish a breach of privilege. On the subject of privilege I have already delivered my sentiments; I cannot pass the limits of the Constitution. As to incidental or inherent powers, they seem to me to be only such as are necessarily attached to some independent substantive powers of legislation, enumerated in the Constitution. Thus the power to send for persons and papers, is incidental to the power of originating impeachment. And the same principle will apply as to all the subordinate regulations essential to carry into operation every specified grant of power. But a new substantive power of legislation, not specified in the Constitution, cannot be exercised as an auxiliary to one which is specified—for example, the power to declare the punishment of treason would not authorize the establishment of a Supreme Court, and such inferior courts as the situation of the country might require; and yet it must be admitted that, to prescribe the punishment of treason, without these courts, to carry the system into operation, would be altogether ineffectual. But to establish judicial tribunals, is not a power subordinate to, but must necessarily be independent of, any other grant of power, and therefore could not be considered as incidental to any other branch of legislation, however they might be connected in their practical operation. I object also to the exercise of implied powers in a case of a criminal nature. In such a case the power ought to be particularly conferred, so as to have no doubt as to its validity and extent. But, Mr. Speaker, that article of the Constitution which gives to Congress power to "make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers, and all other powers vested by the Constitution in

'the Government of the United States, or in any 'department or office thereof," refers in express terms to legislation: "To make all laws which shall be necessary and proper." It gives no inherent power to either branch of the National Government, but enables the Legislature to make such laws as may be requisite to give effect to the powers delegated. In the preceding clause Congress is vested with ample authority to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatever in this District, not exceeding ten miles square. Have we then, sir, fulfilled the trust reposed in us, by making the necessary laws to protect the members of this body from insult, bribery, and corruption within this District, over which we possess such unlimited power? Sir, we have not; and this is the more to be lamented, because the practice of the two Houses, with respect to privileges and contempts, ought to be uniform; it ought to be regulated by law, that neither should, on any occasion, under the sudden impulse of feeling, exercise an arbitrary discretion, inconsistent with the right, the security, and property of the citizen. The nature of the punishment ought to be defined; for, although we claim the right to imprison, it is not pretended that we can inflict a fine, which is unquestionably a lower grade of punishment, and is often inflicted in cases where imprisonment is forbidden. But it has been intimated by some gentlemen who have participated in this debate, that the clauses of the Constitution to which I have referred do not give to Congress the power to legislate on the subjects of bribery and corruption and the privileges of its members. Sir, permit me to refer those gentlemen to the opinions of men, celebrated for their exalted virtues and talents, relative to the power given to Congress over the ten miles square. These opinions were expressed in the Convention of Virginia, assembled to deliberate on this Constitution. The celebrated Patrick Henry, whose memoirs were read with so much pleasure by his countrymen, inveighed against this unlimited power of legislation, and deprecated its consequences at some future period. He was answered by Mr. Madison, the late Chief Magistrate of the United States, and Judge Pendleton, who was an ornament to the bench of the Supreme Court of Virginia, that "this clause does not give 'Congress power to impede the operation of any 'part of the Constitution, or to make any regulation that may affect the interest of the citizens 'of the Union at large. But it gives them power 'over the local police of the place, so as to be secured from any interruption in their proceedings. What then is the power? It is that 'Congress shall exclusively legislate there, in 'order to preserve the police of the place, and 'their own personal independence; that they 'may not be overawed or insulted."

This is a fair exposition of the power, given by the founders of the Constitution. We may pass all laws necessary and proper for carrying into effect our delegated powers; we may exercise exclusive legislation over this District, to regulate its police, and protect ourselves from being overawed or insulted; but until these laws shall be enacted I deny the inherent power of this House to arraign and punish a citizen for a supposed breach of the privilege. And while, sir, I shall ever cherish a proper respect for the dignity and the legitimate privileges of this honorable body, I hold still more sacred the Constitutional rights of the citizen, and shall therefore vote to discharge John Anderson from the custody of the Sergeant-at-Arms.

Mr. HOLMES, of Massachusetts, said the question had been yesterday triumphantly put by his honorable friend from New York, (Mr. SPENCER,) Are we a jury? I, said Mr. H., readily answer no. We are a legislative body, representing eight millions of citizens—a body exercising as important acts of sovereignty as can be exercised, except by the Sovereign of Heaven; and the single question is, can this legislative body protect and defend itself from insult and abuse? If, said Mr. H., a judicial court is treated contemptuously, it seems agreed that the offender may be punished. Should a court of the United States be created by statute, without the power to punish contempts being specially granted, no one will deny that this power is incident to its Constitution. There are courts in the United States which constantly exercise these powers without any special grant. Should a judge of one of these courts, in going from the courthouse to his lodgings, be met and horsewhipped for something relating to his duty as a judge, will it be contended that this act would not be punished as a contempt? Why, then, sir, said Mr. H., is this power incident to a judicial which is denied to a legislative tribunal? If protection and security be essential to the one, they are peculiarly so for the other. I do not insist so much on the common law's giving this right. It is a right essential and inherent in every legislative body, that it shall protect itself. If no precedent existed, if the Constitution, the rules and the laws were silent, I would contend for this right of self-preservation. The framers of the Constitution were acquainted with legislative assemblies and their rights. The rules of the House of Commons, and of the Colonial and State Assemblies, were familiar to them. Had they entertained a doubt of the right in every legislative body to protect itself against violence and corruption, they would have provided for its security. We are invested with authority to legislate for the people. To us is committed the protection of their lives, liberties, and property. How are we to perform these duties if we have no power to defend ourselves against insult?

The gentleman from Mississippi (Mr. PONDREXTER) admits that we have the power to punish a contempt. We only differ, then, in defining the act. He would remove an offensive person from the House, and would defend the body from interruption; but, at the same time, he seems to contend that we have no power but that expressed in the Constitution; hence I was at a loss to perceive how his conclusion would follow his premises. The Constitution gives no express power to punish for contempt; yet he would punish, and still insist upon a literal adherence to the Constitution. It is probable that I did not understand him.

I regret that I did not distinctly hear the gentleman from Louisiana, (Mr. ROBERTSON,) as I always expect to be edified by his remarks. His account of the State constitutions in defining this power, I apprehend, is essentially incorrect. In some of the States this power is expressly given; that of Massachusetts provides for the punishment of any who threatens harm to a member in the place where the General Court is sitting. In other States the power is exercised where it is not expressly delegated. The practice in the Colonial Assemblies has accorded with this claim of the right of this House. And surely it could never have been intended to leave the House of Representatives of the United States destitute of a right, exercised by the most petty Provincial Assembly. Sir, I do not resort to common law. I take the ground that the framers of the Constitution knew what was meant by a legislative body, and that they never intended to give us the powers of legislators, and, at the same time, to deny us the means of exercising those powers. If, while we are performing our duties, any one may offer a member a bribe, and we are destitute of the powers to prevent, arrest, or punish the offender, we exhibit to the world a most singular spectacle of imbecility.

But my honorable friend from Virginia (Mr. BARBOUR) takes strong ground. He opens the Constitution, and insists, unless the instrument expressly gives this power, you have it not. He takes his positions so strong, and urges and defends them with such ability, as seems to invite and defy opposition. I confess that it is with great caution and reluctance that I meet that gentleman in the field of argument; he is an opponent whom I should always prefer to avoid. But as his course is open, frank, manly, and fair, I am bound to hazard the presumption to meet him. He states that exemption from arrest and from accountability for words spoken in the House, are the only privileges expressly given by the Constitution, and infers that all others are, therefore, excluded. That expressly to include one thing, impliedly excludes others, is a principle which I readily admit; but its application to this case I am obliged to deny. These privileges extend to times and places beyond the reach of this House. The privilege from arrest commences before and continues after the existence of this House. It exists before and after the person claiming it is a member. There may be no House organized to protect them in these privileges; special provision, therefore, was necessary, that they might seek relief from the judicial tribunals. To be shielded from accountability for language used in the House is more extensive, and continues during the life of a member.

It is true that the privilege from arrest includes the time of the session, and more. This, however, is a privilege against the operation of a general law. Both of these privileges are protections from acts otherwise lawful. Is it to be inferred, therefore, that there is no security against acts which are unlawful? Singular, indeed, would it be, that our Constitution should take care to guard the Representatives against arrest for just debts, before, and after, and during the time of their attending the session, and at the same time deny the House the privilege to protect itself from abuse and violence. The very circumstance that the Constitution has given to members these privileges, when they are out of the power and protection of the House, and has not guarded the body collectively from fraud and violence, is conclusive evidence that it was believed and understood that self-protection was inherent or incidental. So far, therefore, is this grant of privileges from excluding the power for which we contend, that it supports and confirms it.

And here, sir, I will take the liberty to reply to an objection offered by the gentleman from New Hampshire, (Mr. LIVERMORE.) He states a strong case. Suppose, says he, in coming to this place, I should have been insulted by the governor or a judge of New Hampshire, and should complain to this House, could they send their Sergeant-at-Arms and bring him by force, to answer for the contempt? I should think not. This would be an abuse of a person before he had become a member. This House did not exist when the act was done. The insult was not to this body. Until that gentleman appears, is qualified, and takes his seat, we have no right to his services, and no power over his actions; and hence an insult to him is not an insult to us. My doctrine is this: as soon as a member is subject to our rules, he is entitled to our protection, and every violence or indignity offered to him, as a member, is a contempt of the House. Cases of doubtful character might be stated: if a member, while absent with leave, should be treated contemptuously, can the House send for and punish the offender? Upon my hypothesis, perhaps not, the member not being subject to our control. Suppose him absent without leave; he, having violated our rules, may have forfeited our protection. When these cases of doubt shall happen, it will then be our duty to decide them. It is sufficient for us that the case under consideration is of a bribe offered to an acting member, while the House was sitting, and for the purpose of influencing our deliberations and perverting our decisions.

But the honorable gentleman from Virginia, aware of the consequences to which his doctrines will lead, has endeavored to answer every objection. He admits that we have the exclusive right to this House; and, to prevent disturbances and interruptions, we may exclude from its galleries those who are rude or uncivil. This is all the answer which he gives us; this is the only cure for our inability to punish contempts. While the honorable member from New York (Mr. SPENCER) was denying our powers to punish, a case well nigh happened in the galleries which would have put his principles to the test. There was a little disturbance, and the gentleman was on the point of calling for that protection which he was then attempting to prove this House could not afford. It, however, gave me some consolation that, instead of asking the people to be so obliging as to suspend their conversation until we should have finished our debate, the Speaker ventured, very promptly, to order the noise to be suppressed. All the admission, however, that we can extort from the gentleman from Virginia is, that we have a power to turn out an intruder, if he be rude or uncivil. But suppose that a person in the galleries should amuse himself by throwing stones at the Speaker: before your Sergeant-at-Arms can overtake him he is in the street, out of your power. He is removed, but the abuse of the Speaker remains, and the indignity to the House is unatoned. Suppose while that or some other gentleman was debating, some bully should enter and take him by the throat or nose, and before the Sergeant-at-Arms could interfere he should be pitched headlong down the stairs, and the perpetrator should be off: What is the remedy? Why, forsooth, the person injured might go to a magistrate and make oath, and if he could find the offender, arrest and try him for an assault and battery, fine him in some twenty shillings, and the next day he would return to your galleries and laugh in your face. This remedy, by removal, is all we are allowed. The aggressor, from without, might throw stones at or beat drums under your windows: he might stand at your door, and horsewhip a member as soon as he entered the street, for his conduct on this floor; and this is a private injury, done to a private individual, and to be punished by the ordinary process of law! Some Cromwell, with a few myrmidons, might enter your hall, and with their bayonets drive the members out of the windows like a flock of sheep; and the remedy is, to re-enter and expel them if you can!

But why cite cases? That under consideration is a case of singular atrocity. The chairman of your Committee of Claims is an officer of the first responsibility. To him you have intrusted the keys of your Treasury. His compassion is to be tempted by the repeated importunities of the necessitous. He should set his face like a flint against the clamorous lurkers round your Treasury. He is your guardian angel, with a flaming sword turning every way, to defend this sanctuary of the people. He is faithful, vigilant, and honorable. He holds the purse-strings of the nation, and the man must have a good case, and good luck in the bargain, who shall induce him to untie them. But John Anderson wants money—he does not climb up some other way, and endeavor to enter the back door or the windows—he advances boldly to the front, seizes the keeper, and attempts to wrest from him the keys. You are advised of this atrocity, and indignantly order the culprit to be brought before you. But you are gravely told that this is an act which you have no power to punish or prevent—sympathy succeeds indignation. A citizen is deprived of his liberty! A storm gathers on our brow, the lightning of indignation flashes in the eye, and
